Miriam. Miriam was the first prophetess who praised God in ecstatic strains of poetry, with timbrels and dances, before all the people (Ex. xv. 20). It has been asked (cf. my treatise Ueber Prophetinnen und Zauberinnen in Weimar, Jahrbuch für Deutsche Sprache, vol. iv.), how it comes about that prophetic women constitute a "significant feature" of the old German heathenism only, whereas Jewish and Christian views assigned the gift of prophecy to men. The contrast certainly exists; it rests in the main upon the general difference between the heathen and the Scriptural view of the universe. The subjective nature of woman is more akin to the subjective character of heathenism. So much the higher must Deborah be placed. She was not, like Miriam, the sister of such men as Moses and Aaron. The objective spirit of her God alone elevates her above her people, above heroes before and after her. Not only the ecstasy of enthusiasm, but the calm wisdom of that Spirit which informs the law dwells in her. Of no Judge until Samuel is it expressly said that he was a "prophet." Of none until him can it be said, that he was possessed of the popular authority needful for the office of Judge, even before the decisive deed of his life. The position of Deborah in Israel is therefore a twofold testimony. The less commonly women were called to the office she exercised, the more manifest is the weakness of those who should have been the organs of divine impulses. That she, a woman, became the centre of the people, proves the relaxation of spiritual and manly energy. But on the other hand, the undying might of divine truth, as delivered by Moses, comes brilliantly to view. History shows many instances, where in times of distress, when men despaired, women aroused and saved their nation; but in all such cases there must be an unextinguished spark of the old fire in the people themselves. Israel, formerly encouraged by the great exploit of a left-handed man, is now quickened by the glowing word of a noble woman.

The name Deborah does not occur here for the first time. It was also borne by the nurse of Rebecca, who was buried near Bethel (Gen. xxxv. 8). Many find the name peculiarly appropriate for the prophetess. Its proper meaning is, "bee"; and in Hellenic oracles also bees play an important part (cf. Paus. ix. 40, etc.). This honor they enjoyed, however, only in consequence of the erroneous derivation of the name melitta from melos, a song. In like manner, Deborah (דְּבוֹרָה), the bee, is not connected with dabar (דָּבַר), to speak; nor does it properly mean the "march of the bees" (Gesenius); neither is it "buzzing" (Fürst); but, as melitta from meli, honey, so Deborah is to be derived from debash (דְּבַשׁ), which also means honey, the interchange of r and s being very common (honor, honos, etc.). Deborah is a female name akin in meaning to the German Emma,<sup>1</sup> — and does not necessarily imply any reference to the prophetic office in the case of our Deborah any more than in that of Rebecca's nurse.

A woman of a fiery spirit, אִשָּׁת לַפִּידוֹת. The majority of expositors, ancient as well as modern, regard Lapidoth as the name of Deborah's husband. Yet it was felt by many that there was something peculiar in the words. If the ordinary interpretation were the true one, it would be natural to look also for a statement of the tribe to which the husband belonged. In accordance with the style of the ancients, the designation would have been at least once repeated (at ch. v. 1). To make it seem quite natural for Deborah always to appear without her husband, it had to be assumed that he was already dead. To avoid this, some old Jewish expositors assert that Barak was her husband, — Barak and Lappid being of kindred signification, namely, "lightning" and "flame." But in all this no attention is paid to the uncommonness of the phenomenon presented in the person of a woman such as Deborah. What a burning spirit must her have been, to have attained to such distinction in Israel! It was in perfect keeping with the poetical cast of the language of the age, that the people should seek to indicate the characteristic which gave her her power over them, by calling her אִשָּׁת לַפִּידוֹת. If a capable woman was called אִשָּׁת חַיִל, from חַיִל, strength (Prov.

xxxi. 10), — and a contentious woman, אִשָּׁת מְדִינָה (Prov. xxi. 19); and if in אִשָּׁת פְּסִילוּת (foolish woman, Prov. ix. 13), we are not to regard kesiluth as a proper name, it must also be allowed that אִשָּׁת לַפִּידוֹת may be rendered "woman of the torch-glow," especially when we consider what a fire-bearing, life-kindling personage she was. It is a fact, moreover, that lappid (torch) occurs almost as often in figurative as in literal language. The salvation of Jerusalem shines "like a torch" (Isa. lxii. 1). "Out of his mouth torches go forth" (Job xli. 11 (19)). The appearance of the heroes of Israel is "like torches" (Nah. ii. 5 (4)). The angel who appeared to Daniel had "eyes like torches of fire" (Dan. x. 6). "The word of Elias," says Sirach (xlviii. 1), "burned like a torch." Concerning Phinehas, the priest, the Midrash says, that "when the Holy Ghost filled him, his countenance glowed like torches" (Jalkut, Judges, § 40).

The spirit of Deborah was like a torch for Israel, kindling their languid hearts. It was the power of her prophetic breath which fell on the people. This is the secret of her influence and victory. The moral energy which was at work is traced to its source even in the grammatical form of the word which describes it — לַפִּידוֹת, not לְפִידִים,

She judged Israel. Inasmuch as in the gift of prophecy she had the Spirit of God, she was able to judge. Notwithstanding her rapt and flaming spirit, she was no fanatic. She judged the thronging people according to the principles of the law. The wisdom of this "wise woman" was the wisdom revealed by God in his law. She deals in no mysterious and awful terrors. The מִשְׁפָּטִים (judgment), for which Israel came to Deborah, was clear — did not consist in dark sayings, like the verses of the Pythia, though these also were called θεμύρες, thémures (statutes, ἡρώσεις; cf. Nägelsbach, Nachhom. Theologie, p. 183). The comparison with the Sphinx, instituted by Bochart (Phaleg, p. 471), was not fortunate; not even according to the notions of the grammarian Socrates, who represented the Sphinx as a native soothsayer, who occasioned much harm because the Thebans did not understand her statutes (cf. Jaep, Die griechische Sphinx, p. 15).

Ver. 5. She sat under the palm-tree of Deborah. Under the palm still known to the narrator as that of Deborah (cf. "Luther's oak," in Thüringia). It is impossible to see why C. Böttcher (Ueber den Baunkultus der Hellenen, p. 523) should speak of "Deborah-palms." She sat under a large palm, public and free, accessible to all; not like the German Velleda, who, according to Tacitus, sat in a tower, and to whom no one was admitted, in order to increase the veneration in which she was held. The palm was the common symbol of all Canaan; it adorned the coins of both the Phoenicians (Movers, ii. 1, 7) and the Jews.<sup>1</sup> From these coins, carried far and wide by sailors—and not, as is generally assumed, from the appearance of the coast when approached from sea, which showed many other things besides palm-trees,—arose the custom of calling those who brought them Phoenicians (φοινίξ, the palm). The symbolism of the palm, which the ancients admired in Delos, was based on ideas which were unknown to Israel. It referred to the birth of Apollo, not to divination.

Between ha-Ramah and Beth-el, on Mount Ephraim.<sup>2</sup> Beth-el lay on the border between Ephraim and Benjamin; so likewise Ataroth (Josh. xvi. 2). Robinson discovered an Atara in that region (Bibl. Res., i. 575). Not far from it, he came to a place, called er-Râm, lying on a high hill, which he regarded as the Ramah in Benjamin (Judg. xix. 13), while Ritter (xvi. 537, 538 [Gage's Transl. iv. 230]), identifies it with the Ramah of our passage. Both conjectures are tenable, since neither interferes with the statement that Deborah sat between Beth-el and Ramah, on Mount Ephraim,—on the border, of course, like Bethel itself (cf. בֵּית־אֵל, Josh. xvi. 1).

Ver. 6, 7. And she sent and called Barak out of Kedesh-naphtali. That which especially comes to view here, is the moral unity in which the tribes still continued to be bound together. Deborah, though resident in the south of Ephraim, had her eyes fixed on the tyranny which pressed especially on the tribes of the north. While of the priests at Shiloh none speak, she nevertheless cannot rest while Israel is in bondage. But she turns to the tribes most immediately concerned. Kedesh, to the northwest of Lake Huleh, has been identified in modern times, still bearing its old name. It is situated upon a rather high ridge, in a splendid region (Rob. iii. 366 ff.). There, in Naphtali, lived Barak ("lightning," like Barcas), the man fixed on by Deborah to become the liberator of his people. The names of his father and native place are carefully given, here, and again at ch. v. 1. The power of Deborah's influence shows itself in the fact that Barak, though living so far north, readily answers her summons to the border of Benjamin. At the same time, Barak's obedience to the call of the prophetess, is in itself good evidence, that he is the called deliverer of Israel. But she not only calls him, not only incites him to the conflict; she also gives him the plan of battle which he must follow.

Go, and gradually draw toward Mount Tabor, with ten thousand men of Naphtali and Zebulun (לֵךְ וּבִישְׁבָּתָךְ בְּתֹרַת תָּבוֹר וְנָלְחָמְךָ עִמָּוָה).

The word נָלַח always conveys the idea of drawing, whether that which is drawn be the bow, the furrow, or the prolonged sounds of a musical instrument; tropically, it is also used of the long line of an army, advancing along the plain. Its meaning here, where the object which Barak is to draw is put in another clause, "נָלְחָמְךָ עִמָּוָה עֲשֶׂרֶת," is made plain by the analogous passage, Ex. xii. 21. There Moses says, מִשְׁכְּבוֹ יִקְרָאוּ לָכֶם צֹאן

לְמִשְׁפְּחוֹתֵיכֶם; and the sense is evidently that the families are to sacrifice the passover one after another (מִשְׁכְּבָה), each in its turn killing its own lamb. The same successive method is here enjoined by Deborah. Barak is to gather ten thousand men toward mount Tabor, one after another, in small squads. This interpretation of the word is strengthened by the obvious necessity of the case. The tyrant must hear nothing of the rising, until the hosts are assembled; but how can their movements be concealed, unless they move in small companies? For the same reason they are to assemble, not at Kedesh, but at a central point, readily accessible to the several tribes. Mount Tabor (Jebel Tor), southwest of the Sea of Tiberias, is the most isolated point of Galilee, rising in the form of a cone above the plain, and visible at a great distance, though its height is only 1755 (according to Schubert, 1748) fathoms.<sup>3</sup> Barak, however, is not to remain in his position on the mountain. If Sisera's tyranny is to be broken, its forces must be defeated in the plain; for there the iron chariots of the enemy have their field of action. Hence, Deborah adds that Sisera will collect his army at the brook Kishon, in the plain of Jezreel. "And I"—she speaks in the "Spirit of Jehovah"—"will draw him unto thee, and deliver him into thine hand."

Ver. 8. And Barak said. Barak has no doubt as to the truth of her words, nor does he fear the enemy; but yet he will go only if Deborah go with him, not without her. Her presence legitimizes the undertaking as divine. It shows the tribes he summons, that he seeks no interest of his own—that it is she who summons them. He wishes to stand forth as the executor merely of the command which comes through her. The attempt to draw a parallel between Deborah and Jeanne d'Arc, though it readily suggests itself, will only teach us to estimate the more clearly the peculiar character of the Jewish prophetess. The latter does not herself draw the sword, for then she would not have needed Barak. Joan, like Deborah, spoke pregnant words of truth, as when, on being told that "God could conquer without soldiers," she simply replied, "the soldiers will fight, and then God will give victory;" but she fought only against the enemies of her country, not the enemies of her faith and spiritual life. It was a romantic faith in

the right and truth of an earthly sceptre, for which the poor maiden fell: the voice which called Deborah to victory was the voice of the Universal Sovereign. No trace of sentimentalism, like that of Dunois, can be discovered in Barak; nevertheless, he voluntarily retires behind the authority of a woman, because God animates and inspires her.

Vers. 9, 10. She said: the expedition on which thou goest, shall not be for thine honour; for Jehovah will give Sisera into the hand of a woman. The victory will be ascribed, not to Barak, but to Deborah. It will be said, "a woman conquered Sisera." This is the first and obvious meaning of the words;<sup>1</sup> by the deed of Jael they were fulfilled in yet another sense. The honor of hewing down Sisera did not fall to Barak. Nevertheless, Barak insists on his condition. He will have the conflict sanctified by her presence. Something similar appears in Greek tradition: with reference to a battle in the Messenian war it is said (Paus. iv. 16), that "the soldiers fought bravely, because their Seers were present."

And Deborah arose, and went with Barak to Kedesh. For the sake of the great national cause, she leaves her peaceful palm; and by her readiness to share in every danger, evidences the truth of her announcements. Kedesh, Barak's home, is the place from which directions are to be issued to the adjacent tribes. Thither she accompanies him; and thence he sends out his call to arms. Some authority for this purpose, he must have had long before: it is now supported by the sanction of the prophetess. When it is said, that he "called Zebulun and Naphtali to Kedesh," it is evident that only the leaders are intended. It cannot be supposed that the troops, in whole or in part, were first marched up to Kedesh, and then back again, southward, to Tabor. In Kedesh, he imparts the plan to the heads of families. Led by these, the troops collect, descending on all sides from their mountains, like the Swiss against Austria, and proceed towards Tabor—"on foot" (יָבִיטִים), for they have neither chariots nor cavalry. Their numbers constantly augment, till they arrive on Tabor,—Barak and Deborah always at their head.

Ver. 11. And Heber, the Kenite, had severed himself from Kain, the sons of Hobab, the brother-in-law of Moses. We read above that the tribe of the Kenite, the father-in-law of Moses, decamped from Jericho with the tribe of Judah (ch. i. 16), and, while the latter carried on the war of conquest, settled in Arad. From there the family of Heber has separated itself. While one part of the tribe has sought a new home for itself below, in the extreme south of Judah, the other encamps high up, in the territory of Naphtali. It is as if the touching attachment of this people to Israel still kept them located at the extremities of the Israelitish encampment, in order, as of old, to show them the way. Above, ch. i. 16, they are called "sons of the Kenite, the father-in-law of Moses"; here, "Kain (cf. Num. xxiv. 22), the sons of Hobab, the brother-in-law of Moses." Ancient expositions<sup>2</sup> have been the occasion of unnecessary confusion as to Jethro's name. יתרו means to contract affinity by marriage; and, just as in German Schwäher (father-in-law) and Schwager (brother-in-law) are at bottom one, so the Hebrew יתרו may stand for both father-in-law and brother-in-law. The father-in-law of Moses was Jethro; as priest, he was called Reuel (רְעוּל). He did not accompany Israel, but after his visit to Moses, went back to his own land (Ex. xviii. 27). His son Hobab, however (Num. x. 29), had remained with Israel; and when he also would return home, Moses entreated him to abide with them, that he might be for eyes to them on the way, and promised him a share in whatever good might be in store for Israel. The proposal was accepted, and the promise was kept. In the north and south of Canaan, the Kenites had their seats. They are here designated "sons of Hobab," because it was from him, the ancient guide of Israel, that they derived their position in the land. Heber's tent was in the vicinity of Kedesh, near Elon Zaanannim,<sup>3</sup> mentioned also at Josh. xix. 33, as a place on the border of Naphtali. The name may have originated from the sojourn of the Kenites; a supposition which becomes necessary, if with an eye to Isa. xxxiii. 20,<sup>4</sup> it be interpreted to mean the "oak of the wandering tent."<sup>5</sup>

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Compare the reflections at the end of the next section.

[BISHOP HALL: It is no wonder if they, who, ere fourscore days after the law delivered, fell to idolatry alone; now, after four-score years since the law restored, fell to idolatry among the Canaanites. Peace could in a shorter time work looseness in any people. And if forty years after Othniel's deliverance they relapsed, what marvel is it, that in twice forty years after Ehud they thus miscarried?—THE SAME: Deborah had been no prophetess, if she durst have sent in her own name: her message is from Him that sent herself. "Hath not the Lord God of Israel commanded?" Barak's answer is faithful, though conditional; and doth not so much intend a refusal to go without her, as a necessary bond of her presence with him. Who can blame him, that he would have a prophetess in his company? If the man had not been as holy as valiant, he would not have wished such society.—THE SAME: To prescribe that to others, which we draw back from doing ourselves, is an argument of hollowness and falsity. Barak shall see that Deborah doth not

<sup>1</sup> [This is the first and obvious meaning of the words, and it is very strange that Bachmann should pronounce this interpretation, from which but for Jael no one would ever have dreamed of departing, impossible.—T.]

<sup>2</sup> In giving Jethro seven names, homiletical applications were followed. Thus, Hobab was taken as a surname of Jethro, "because he was dear to God." (Jalkut, Judges, n. 33.)

<sup>4</sup> [Where, according to De Wette's translation, Jerusalem is spoken of as a "Zelt das nicht wandert"—a tent that does not wander.—T.]

<sup>5</sup> The reading ἑρως ἀνακαταβύτης, found in some Greek versions, expounds יָבִיטִים אֵלֶּן as if it came from יָבִיטִים; while the ἀνακαταβύτης of other versions gives it the sense of יָבִיטִים, which is so rendered, Jer. xlviii. 11.

offer him that cup wherof she dares not begin: without regard of her sex, she marches with him to Mount Tabor, and rejoices to be seen of the ten thousand of Israel. — HENGSTENBERG (Genuineness of the Pentateuch, ii. 101): To grant succor through a woman was calculated to raise heavenwards the thoughts of men, which are so prone to cleave to the earth. If the honor was due to God alone, they would be more disposed to show their gratitude by sincere conversion. That Barak was obliged to lean on Deborah, depended on the same law by which Gideon was chosen to be the deliverer of Israel from the Midianites, though his family was the meanest in Manassch, and himself the youngest in his father's house; that law by which Gideon was divinely directed to take only three hundred men from the whole assembled host; the women Deborah and Jael stand in the same category with the ox-goad of Shamgar. In all ages God is pleased to choose for his service the inconsiderable and the despised. — TR.]

CHAPTER IV. 12-24.

12 And they shewed Sisera that Barak the son of Abinoam was gone up to Mount 13 Tabor. And Sisera gathered [called] together all his chariots [his whole chariotforce], even nine hundred chariots of iron, and all the people that were with him, from Harosheth of the Gentiles [Harosheth Hagojim] unto the river [brook] of Kishon.
14 And Deborah said unto Barak, Up; for this is the day in which the Lord [Jehovah] hath delivered [delivereth] Sisera into thine hand: is [doth] not the Lord [Jehovah] gone [go] out before thee? So Barak went down from Mount Tabor, and 15 ten thousand men after him. And the Lord [Jehovah] discomfited [confounded] Sisera, and all his [the] chariots, and all his [the] host, with the edge of the sword<sup>1</sup> before Barak; so that [and] Sisera lighted down off his chariot, and fled away on 16 his feet. But [And] Barak pursued after the chariots, and after the host, unto Harosheth of the Gentiles [Harosheth Hagojim]: and all the host of Sisera fell 17 upon [by] the edge of the sword; and there was not a man left. Howbeit, Sisera fled<sup>2</sup> away on his feet to the tent of Jael the wife of Heber the Kenite: for there was 18 peace between Jabin the king of Hazor and the house of Heber the Kenite. And Jael went out to meet Sisera, and said unto him, Turn in, my lord, turn in to me; fear not. And when he had turned [And he turned] in unto her into the tent, [and] she 19 covered him with a mantle.<sup>3</sup> And he said unto her, Give me, I pray thee, a little water to drink; for I am thirsty. And she opened a bottle of milk [the milk-skin], and gave 20 him drink, and covered him. Again [And] he said unto her, Stand in the door of the tent, and it shall be, when any man doth come and inquire of thee, and say, Is 21 there any man here? that thou shalt say, No. Then [And] Jael Heber's wife took a nail of the tent [the tent-pin], and took an [the] hammer in her hand, and went softly unto him, and smote [drove] the nail [pin] into his temples, and fastened it [and it pressed through] into the ground: for he was fast asleep, and weary. So 22 he died.<sup>4</sup> And behold, as [omit: as] Barak pursued Sisera, [and] Jael came out [went] to meet him, and said unto him, Come, and I will shew thee the man whom thou seekest. And when he came into her tent, behold, Sisera lay dead, and the 23 nail [pin] was in his temples. So God subdued on that day Jabin the king of 24 Canaan before the children [sons] of Israel. And the hand of the children [sons] of Israel prospered, and prevailed [grew continually heavier] against Jabin the king of Canaan, until they had destroyed Jabin king of Canaan.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL

[1 Ver. 15. — לְפִי־חֶרֶב. Standing in connection with יָדָהּ, these words are of somewhat difficult interpretation. Dr. Cassel's rejection of them will not commend itself to most critics; nor is the provisional translation he gives of them, "in the conflict," exactly clear. The best view is probably that of Bachmann, that the expression denotes the great operative cause by which Jehovah confounded the enemy. Barak's men, rushing down from the mountain, and falling suddenly on the hosts of Sisera, cutting down with remorseless sword all that stood in their way, threw the enemy into utter confusion; and the effect is rightly ascribed to Jehovah, from whose Spirit both the impulse and the strength to execute proceeded. — Ta.]

[3 Ver. 17. — Dr. Cassel translates by the pluperfect: "And fled," cf. below. But it seems better to retain the indefinite perfect. The narrative left Sisera for a moment, in order in ver. 18 briefly to indicate the fate of the army, but now returns to him. Cf. 1 Kg. xx. 30, and many similar instances. — Ta.]

[3 Ver. 18. — קִרְיָאֵל. This word means a "covering;" but exactly what sort of covering is uncertain. Dr. Cassel translates here by Regenmantel, raincoat, perhaps to indicate its close, impervious texture. Dr. Bachmann thinks it was "probably a rather large covering or mat of thick, soft material (perhaps skin or goat's-hair), on which a person lay down and in which he at the same time wrapped himself up, — a sort of mattress and coverlet in one. Similar articles still form part of the furniture of the Bedouin's tent and the Fellah's dwelling." He derives the word from קִרְיָאֵל = קִרְיָאֵל, in its usual sense to support, to lean, specifically to recline at table. Accordingly the proper meaning of the word would be "supporting;" then, concretely, that which supports or serves to recline upon. — Ta.]

[4 Ver. 21. — Dr. Cassel: "and he — for weariness he had fallen fast asleep — died." Kell: "Now he was fallen into a deep sleep, and was wearied (i. e. from weariness he had fallen fast asleep); and so he died." Similarly Bachmann. The clause וַיִּפֹּל — וַיִּפֹּל is manifestly designed to set forth the circumstances which enabled Jael to approach Sisera unperceived; consequently, the "for" of the English version is perfectly proper, and formally not less correct than Dr. Cassel's German, which was only designed to correct Luther's version: "he however, fell asleep, swooned away, and died." Dr. Wordsworth (p. 99) considers it a mistake to suppose that Jael "smote a nail into Sisera's head while he was asleep." He would render: "and he fell down astounded, and fainted away, and died." The passage is a curiosity in interpretation. — Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Intensely vivid pictures, and of the highest historical clearness, are drawn in these simple sentences. The reader is conducted, in imagination, into the tumult of the battle, and stands horror-stricken in the tent of Jael.

Ver. 12. And they told Sisera. Jabin was in Hazor, Sisera in Harosheth Hagojim. Since the tidings from Tabor come to Sisera, he must have been near the scene of action; whilst Jabin appears to be at a distance from all the events narrated.

Vers. 13, 14. And he called together, וַיִּקְרָא.

וַיִּקְרָא means properly, to cry; here, as in ver. 10, to assemble by crying, anrufen: he mobilizes the troops quartered round about. Everything revolves about Sisera. He is the prominent, controlling personage; commander, probably, of the mercenaries, who on account of their mixed<sup>1</sup> character, were also perhaps called Gojim. The chariots, which Sisera orders to be sent to the brook Kishon, must already have been in the plain, since otherwise they could not have been transported. Their head-quarters cannot have been anywhere else than at Beisan, where at the same time they commanded the best chariot and cavalry roads to the country beyond the Jordan. The plain of Jezreel to which he conducts them, is ground on which his army can properly unfold itself. He leads them to the southwest side of Tabor, where the mountain shows its greatest depression. It must have been his intention, in case Barak did not attack, to surround him on the mountain, and thus compel him to descend into the valley. But before the terrible chariot-force has well arranged itself, the Israelitish army, fired with divine enthusiasm by Deborah, and led by Barak, charges down on the flanks of the enemy, and breaks up their battle ranks. Everything is thrown into confusion — panic terrors ensue, — everything turns to flight. The great captain has lost his head; of all his strategic plans nothing remains; only presence of mind enough is left him to seek salvation from destruction by not fleeing in his chariot, nor with the others.

Vers. 15-24. And Jehovah confounded them Deborah had promised that God would go before them — as He went before Joshua, not visibly as an angel (as the Targum has it), but in the might of his Spirit, which He puts upon his heroes. It is by that quickening Spirit that, in their charge from the height, Barak becomes lightning, and Deborah a torch, by which the enemy is consumed.

וַיִּכְאֵם, "He confounded them," as He confounded the host of the Egyptians (Ex. xiv. 24). When confusion enters the ranks of the chariots, all is lost. They are then worse than useless. God did this, that Israel might conquer.

In the conflict, וַיִּכְאֵם. This is the only meaning which these words can have, if they properly belong here. In that case, however, the phraseology וַיִּכְאֵם . . . . וַיִּכְאֵם is peculiar, and admits only of an artificial explanation. Bertheau's idea, that God is represented as a champion hero with his sword, is altogether inadmissible. To me it seems likely that וַיִּכְאֵם did not originally stand here at all, but slipped in from ver. 16, an error easily accounted for by the fact that the next word, לְפָנָי, begins with the same letters.

And Sisera lighted down off his chariot. Because on that he was likely to be recognized. The bulk of the army, on account of the chariots, can only flee along the plain, back to Harosheth, whence they advanced. Sisera takes to his feet, in order to escape by other roads. He foresees that Barak will pursue the army, and look for him there. Therefore he secretly flees in a northern direction towards Hazor; and gains thereby at all events the advantage that Barak seeks him in the other direction, towards Harosh-manner, Symmachus explains the king of Elam, who invaded Palestine, to be the king of the Scythians. The historical fact that people of Scythian manners served in the armies of the Phoenicians, may serve to render the existence of a Scythian colony at Beisan more probable at least, than it is on the basis of the traditions communicated by Pliny and others, which are only like similar stories current at Antioch and elsewhere.

eth. During the tumult in which his proud army is shattered by the heroic deeds of Israel, he has succeeded in getting well on towards his destination, and thinks himself to have found a safe hiding-place with a friend. The language is desig-natedly chosen to indicate this order of events: first, ver. 15, and Sisera fled; then, ver. 16, Barak pursued; finally, ver. 17, Sisera had fled. — Between Heber the Kenite and Jabin there was peace; the Kenite therefore had not shared the oppression under which Israel suffered. Consequently, Sisera could hope to find in his tent a little rest from the fatigue of his long-continued<sup>1</sup> exertions. Securer still was the shelter of the woman's tent. In that of Heber, he might have feared the violence of Barak: the tent of a woman no one enters with hostile purpose. He seems first to have made inquiries. She meets him with friendly mien, invites him urgently, and quiets his apprehensions: "fear not," she says; she prepares him a couch that he may rest himself, and covers him carefully with a close covering. The covering is called שֶׁמֶרֶץ, a word which occurs only here. The derivations given in Bochart (Phaleg, 748) and in the recent lexicons (Gesenius, Fürst), throw no light on it.

שֶׁמֶרֶץ is the Syriac and Chaldee שֶׁמֶרֶץ hide, skin, leather; Arabic, شمر (cf. Freytag, Lex. Arab., iv., sub voce), cilicium, saccus. This is finally indicated by those Greek versions (followed also by Augustine; and cf. Rörðam, p. 83) which translate it δέπρις; for that means not only "hide," but also "leathern covering," and a female garment, according to the Etymol. Magnum, where we read of a γυνή μέλαινα δέπριον ἡμφιεσμένη. Thus also the direction of certain Rabbins that this word is to be interpreted as שֶׁמֶרֶץ (stragula), explains itself. The Targum also agrees with this; for it has שֶׁמֶרֶץ, καυνάκη, a covering rough on one side. Nor is anything else meant by the word שֶׁמֶרֶץ (in Targum of Jon., Deut. xxiv. 13). It must be a close covering, fitted to conceal the soldier who lies under it.

Sisera is not incautious. He proceeds to ask for drink, pleading thirst. She gives him of her milk. It is an ancient, oriental practice, common to all Bedouins, Arabs, and the inhabitants of deserts in general, that whoever has eaten or drunk anything in the tent, is received into the peace of the house. The Arab's mortal enemy slumbers securely in the tent of his adversary, if he have drunk with him. Hence, Saladin refuses to give drink to the bold Frank Knight, Reinald of Chatillon, because he wishes to kill him (Marin, Hist. of Saladin, ii. 19). Sisera thinks that he may now safely yield to sleep. Only he feels that he ought first to instruct Jael how to answer any pursuers that may come. How did he deceive himself! Sisera is made to know the demonlike violence [dämonische Gewalt] of a woman's soul; which, when it breaks loose, knows no bounds. True, Jabin is at peace with Heber. But Jael's race and its history have from time immemorial intergrown with those of Israel. Israel's freedom is her freedom; Israel's glory, her glory. How many women have been dishonored and carried away as booty by Sisera (ch. v. 30)! Shall she be idle, when the tyrant gives himself up into her hands? What, if she saves him? Will it not be treason on her part against the ancient covenant with Israel? Will he not, by virtue of his vigor and skill, collect fresh troops, and threaten Israel anew? Shall it be said, Jael saved the enemy of the people among whom she lived as among brothers, to their destruction? The conflict in which she finds herself is great; and none but a great and powerful soul could end it as she does. She will not allow him to escape — as he will do, if she refuse to harbor him; and yet, she can harbor him only to destroy, — and that not without doing violence to ancient popular custom. She makes her decision. She scorns the reward which Sisera's safety might perhaps have brought her. She takes the nobler object into consideration — the freedom of a kindred nation, — and the older right preponderates. A ruthless warrior stands before her, the violator of a thousand laws of right, and all hesitation vanishes. She has no sword with which to hew the oppressor down, and seizes the terrible weapon of womanly cunning, before which no law can stand. Besides, it has been noticed, even in modern times, that in general the women of those regions care less about the rights of hospitality than the men. Burkhardt in his wanderings had personal experience of this (Ritter, xiv. 179).

Jael, through her terrible deed, far surpasses similar female characters of other times and nations. Concerning the Greek Aretophila, of Cyrene, Plutarch (On the Virtues of Women, n. 19) exclaims: "Her glorious deed raises her to the rank of the most ancient heroines!" What was her deed? By poison, lies, and perjury, she finally succeeded in overthrowing the tyrant who loved her, the husband who trusted her! But she would never have risen to such an undertaking, had he not slain her first husband. Still more horrible is the Chriemhild of the German Nibelungen. She invites those whom she wishes to murder, from a great distance; she not only violates the rights of hospitality, but her victims are her own relatives, countrymen, and friends. Jael has no by-ends, no personal wrong to avenge; the tyrant is a stranger to her, and not properly her enemy. But he is the oppressor of the freedom of the people of God, with whose life her own and that of her race have become identified. She does a demonlike deed, — but does it solely and purely in the service of general ideas.<sup>2</sup>

1 [STANLEY: "It must have been three days after the battle that he reached a spot, which seems to gather into itself, as in the last scene of an eventful drama, all the characters of the previous acts." — Ta.]

2 [Dr. Wordsworth, treating the question, "What is the true character of Jael's act?" argues that as it was commended by the Song of Deborah, and as that Song "is recited by the Holy Ghost as the utterance of one who spoke by his own inspiration," it follows that "Jael must have received a special commission from God to attempt and perform this act." Much in the history, he says, "confirms this conclusion." What he adduces, however, is not worth repeating. Dr. Bachmann enters into the discussion very fully. The salient points of his essay may, however, be stated in few words. He thinks it unquestionable that the language of Deborah, ch. iv. 9, "Jehovah shall sell Sisera into the hand of a woman," is a prediction of the chieftain's destruction by Jael. This utterance of the prophetess cannot have been unknown to Jael. Hence, when the latter sees Sisera approach her tent for shelter, she at once obtains the clear and certain conviction that it is by her hands that he is to fall. She therefore acts under a divine commission. Her invitation to Sisera, her promise of protection, and her honorable entertainment of him, are not to be defended. But "although she transcended the proper limits in the means she employed, it is not to be denied that the operation of

It had not been necessary for her to kill him. Scarcely was her deed accomplished, before Barak, swift as lightning both in battle and in pursuit, appeared. But, since it was done, it served to manifest the faithfulness of the Kenite, and to increase the disgrace of Jabin. Barak had gained nothing by personally slaying the flying foe; only the honor of the hostile chieftain had been subserved, if he had fallen by the sword of the hero. Filled with astonishment, Barak enters the tent of Jael — a noble subject for the painter's pencil! — and before him lies the mighty Sisera, a dead man, nailed to the earth by a woman! A victory thus begun, could not but end magnificently. Continually more telling were the blows that fell on Jabin's head, until his power was annihilated. No other Jabin reigned in Hazor. His name is thrice repeated in verses 23 and 24, in order to emphasize its importance.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Deborah, the female Judge, full of fire, and Barak the hero. Israel's sin remains ever the same. When their hero dies, when the elders who have seen the works of God are no more, the younger generation apostatizes. So perverse and cowardly is the human heart; and times do not change, nor experience teach it. — STARKE: Peace and too prosperous days are not long good for men.

But the danger of the judgment becomes ever greater, the tyranny of sin ever stronger and nearer. The king of Aram, whom Othniel smote, was distant; the king of Moab, beyond the Jordan; but the king of Hazor is in the midst of the land, possessed of unprecedented power. However, the greater the power of the enemy, the more manifest become the wonders of God's compassion. The deliverer raised up against Moab, though left-handed, is a man; but against the master of nine hundred iron chariots, the battle is waged through a woman. Thus, 1. the heathen learn that victory comes not by horses or horsemen, but by the word of God; and, 2. Israel is humbled, not only by the judgment, but also by the mercy, of God.

There was no want of warlike men in Israel; but lances break like rushes, when the heart is not courageous. Israel, with all its strong men, is impotent so long as it lacks faith in its God. Barak the Spirit of God influenced her deed, nor that she acted from the impulse of the obedience of faith. It is, moreover, only from this point of view that we obtain an explanation of the fact that Deborah in her judgment (ch. v. 24 ff.) so entirely overlooked the human weakness that clung to Jael's is a valiant hero, but a woman must call him. His name is "Lightning," and his deeds are mighty; but the lightning is kindled by the fire-words of the prophetess. As Moses sings after the exodus, "The Lord is a man of war, the Lord is his name," so Deborah's word and song testify that God alone can save. To make this truth seen and believed by all, He lends his victory to a woman. Thus the vanity of men reveals itself, who ascribe to themselves that which belongs to God. Military readiness is of no avail, when readiness of spirit is not cherished. Not legions, but prophets, guard the kingdom of God. God only can conquer, and He suffers not men to prescribe the instruments of conquest.

Barak was a valiant hero, for he was obedient. He followed, but did not begin. Hence, also, though he gained the victory in the field, he nevertheless did not complete it. He took his impulse from a woman, — with Deborah, but not without her, he was willing to go where he went; a woman likewise finished the victory, when Jael slew the leader of the enemy. He waited for the spirit which Deborah breathed into him; not so did Jael wait for his sword to lay Sisera low. Hence, a woman's name became connected both with the beginning and the end of the great achievement. Thus God grants results according to the measure of courage. As we believe, so we have. If Barak had believed like Deborah, he would have been as near to God as she was. But the Spirit of God needs no soldiers to conquer. He glorifies, through his word, the despised things of the world. Jesus selected as disciples, not athletes, but children of God who sought their Father. Put up thy sword, He said to Peter. When risen from the dead, it was to a woman that He first appeared.

STARKE: Holy men love holy company, for therein they find a great blessing. — THE SAME: We with our distrust often close God's hands, so that but for our own actions, He would give us far more than He does; for God is more inclined to give, than we to receive. — THE SAME: So are men's hearts in the hands of God, that out of the timid He can make heroes, and out of heroes, cowards. — GERLACH: The holy faith that animates the deed of Jael, is of divine origin; the ways and methods, however, of rude and savage times continue in part until the time when all the promises of God in Christ shall be fulfilled.

deed." Compare the remarks of Dean Stanley, Hist. of the Jewish Church, i. 365-370. — TR.

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

The special sign of the prophetic spirit, is the use of lyrical expression. The praise of God, and the proclamation of his mighty deeds, burst from the prophets in the rapture of poetic visions. Their language is glowing and powerful, like a torch in the night. This lofty view of the nature of poetry shows itself everywhere. Poets, says Socrates, speak like men divinely inspired, like those who deliver oracles. Among the Romans, legendary tradition (Liv. i. 7) told of an ancient prophetic nymph, Carmenta (from Carmen). Of no Judge is it expressly said that he was a prophet: this is affirmed of Deborah alone; and she alone among them sang, — and that, not merely as Miriam, who with her women formed the responsive choir to Moses' song, but as Moses, the victor, himself.

She sang, שָׁרָה. She was the creator of the song. Quite parallel is the expression, Ex. xv. 1: "then sang Moses and the sons of Israel" (שָׁרָה), not "they sang." Moses, divinely inspired, composed the song, and the people sang it. The case was similar with Deborah. The feminine of the verb, with the following connective, וְ, expresses the independent creation and the joint-execution of the Song; for already in the fourth chapter, Barak stands for the most part for the people themselves. Thus, Barak has gone up to Mount Tabor, ch. iv. 12; Sisera's army is thrown into confusion before Barak, ver. 15; Barak pursues, ver. 16; etc. Here also, therefore, Barak takes the place which in the Song of Moses the "children of Israel" occupy. He and his men raise Deborah's hymn as their song of triumph; and thus it becomes a national hymn. Song is the noblest ornament which the nations of antiquity can devise for victory. They preserve its utterances tenaciously, both as evidences of their prowess, and as incentives to action in times of dishonor. In the days of Pausanias (in the second century after Christ), and therefore about 800 years after the event, the Messenians still sang a triumphal song of the time of Aristomenes (Paus. iv. 16). Perhaps the most interesting remnant of German recollections of Arminius, is the Westphalian popular song, still sung in the region of what was once the field of victory (cf. Horkel, in Der Gesch. der Deutschen Vorzeit, i. 257). In the case of Israel, whose victories are the steps in its national work, and the evidences of its religious truth, the interest of such a song is the greater, because there tradition moulded the conscience of the generations, and fidelity to its earliest history formed the conditions of the national calling, greatness, and glory.

The form of the Song, as of the old Hebrew poetry generally, is that of free rhythm. The Song is a poetical stream: everywhere poetical, and yet untrammelled by any artistic division into strophes. Such a division, it is true, is not altogether wanting; but it is never made a rule. Consequently, efforts to force it systematically on the poem, while only traces of it show themselves, are all in vain. There is no want of finish; introduction and conclusion are well defined; but the pauses subordinate themselves to the thoughts, and these unfold themselves free as the waves. The peculiar character of the Song consists in the boldness of its imagery and the force of its unusual language. It appropriates, in a natural manner, all those forms which genuine poetry does not seek but produce; but it appropriates them all with a freedom which endures none as a rule, yet without, like the natural stream, violating harmony. The Song, then, has strophes, but they are not of equal measure; it moves along in parallelisms, but with variations corresponding to the movement of the thought. The most interesting feature to be noticed, is the alliteration, which appears in the highest development and delicacy, as elsewhere only in the old Norse poems, but also with considerable freedom from restraint. It is important to notice this, because it testifies, more than any division into strophes that may exist, to the nature of the popular song and its lyrical use. The divisions which the poem certainly shows, are determined only by its own course of thought. They are: the praise of God, as introduction (vers. 2-5); the delineation of the emergency (vers. 6-8); the call to praise that the evil no longer exists (vers. 9-11); delineation of the victory and the victors (vers. 12-23); the fate of the enemy (vers. 24-31). The renderings which distinguish the following translation from the older versions extant, will be justified under the several verses in which they occur.<sup>1</sup>

1 [The author's version of the Song forms an essential part of his exposition, and we therefore substitute a translation of it, adhering as closely as practicable to his German, for the ordinary English text. For Dr. Cassel's rendering of שָׁרָה, cf. "Textual and Grammatical," note 1, p. 22. In general, it will be seen that he does not anxiously aim at literalness. The black-faced letters are designed to imitate, rather than reproduce, the alliteration which in our author's view forms a marked feature of the poem (see above). It may be useful to some readers to be referred to the following readily accessible English versions of the Song: Robinson's, with an extended commentary, in Bibl. Repository, 1831, p. 568; "Review of Hollmann on the Song of Deborah," Chris. Spectator (New Haven), ii. 307; Robbins, "The Song of Deborah," Bibliotheca Sacra, 1855, p. 597; Milman's version, in Hist. of the Jews, i. 292; Stanley's, in Jewish Church, i. 370. The whole special literature of the subject is given by Bachmann, i. 298 ff. — Tr.]

INTRODUCTION.

Vers. 2-5.

- 2 That in Israel wildly waved the hair
In the people's self-devotion, — Praise God!
3 Hear, O ye kings, give ear, O ye princes:
I for God,<sup>1</sup> unto Him will I sing,
I will strike the strings unto God, the Lord of Israel!
4 O God, at thy march from Seir,
At thy going forth from Edom's fields,
The earth trembled, and the heavens dropped,
Yea, the clouds dropped down water.
5 The mountains were dismayed before God,
Even this<sup>2</sup> Sinai, before God, the Lord of Israel.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 3. — Dr. Cassel: Ich für Gott; but the accents separate לַיהוָה from אֶלֶּי, and there appears no good reason for disregarding them. The position and repetition of the subject אֶלֶּי serve to bring the person of the Singer prominently into view, and that not in her character as woman, but as prophetess, filled with the Spirit of God, and therefore entitled to challenge the attention of kings and princes. So Bachmann. — Ta.]

[2 Ver. 5. — זוֹ סִינַי: literally, "this Sinai." "Sinai is present to the poetic eye of Deborah" (Wordsworth). Dr. Cassel translated by the definite article, der Sinai. — Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Ver. 2. The above translation of ver. 2<sup>1</sup> differs from all earlier renderings, which however also differ more or less from each other. The most interesting among them is that of those Greek versions which render "ἐν τῇ ἀπεισθεῖαι ἀρχηγίας." It has been followed by a multitude of esteemed expositors (Schnurrer, Rosenmüller, Ewald, Bertheau, Böttger, Kemink); and yet it betrays its Egyptian origin, since in connection with פְּרָעָה it thought only of the Egyptian Pharaoh or king, and expounded accordingly. A similar, more homiletical interpretation proceeds from the Targum. This was more naturally reminded of פְּרָעָה, ultio, vindicta; the Midrash, by speaking of the cessation of the sufferings, whose previous existence is implied in the necessity for vengeance, shows that it adopts the same interpretation. Teller also, perhaps unconsciously, arrived at the same explanation. The interpretation of Raschi, who takes פְּרָעָה as equivalent to פְּרָצָה, and of those who suppose it equivalent to פְּרָצָה, may, like various others, be passed over in silence. The natural exposition, which is always at the same time the poetical, has on all sides been overlooked. פְּרָעָה is undoubtedly (as in Arabic) the hair of the head, and more particularly the long, waving hair, the coma,<sup>2</sup> as appears from Ezek. xlv. 20. פְּרָעוֹת is its plural form, and is used in Deut.

בְּפָרֹעַ פְּרָעוֹת בְּשׂוֹמְרָאֵל
בְּהַרְגֵנָב עִם פְּרָכֵי יְהוָה:

<sup>2</sup> That we must go back to the sense of this word, is also admitted by Kell; but he attaches a meaning to it which it never has. [Kell: פְּרָעוֹת here means properly xxxii. 42, where blood is spoken of as flowing down from the hairy head (מֵרֹאשׁ פְּרָעוֹת אֹיֵב).

Hence the verb פָּרַע (cf. κομῆναι, to cultivate the hair), signifies "to make loose," to allow to "become wild," as when the hair flies wild and loose about the neck; wherefore it is said of Aaron (Ex. xxxii. 25) that he had caused the people פָּרַעַה, "to grow wild," and of the people that they "had grown wild" (פָּרַעַה). The circumstances under which the hair was allowed to grow, are well known. The person who makes a vow, who would be holy unto God, is directed (Num. vi. 5) to let his hair grow (יָבֵל פְּרָעָה). The instance of Samson, to which we shall come hereafter, is familiar. The present occasion for this observance arose עַם בְּהַרְגֵנָב,<sup>3</sup> when the people consecrated themselves, devoted themselves (se devovit), to God, — the people, namely, who gave heed to the voice of Deborah, and placed themselves in the position of one who called himself holy unto God. Israel, through disobedience, had fallen into servitude. Those who followed Barak, had faith in God; upon the strength of this faith they hazarded their lives. They devoted themselves wholly as a sacrifice to God. The verse therefore exhibits a profound apprehension of the essential nature of the national life. It sets forth the ground of the very possibility of the Song, and therefore stands at its head. Israel could be victorious only by repentance and return to obedience.<sup>4</sup> The prophetess delineates, poetically and with forcible beauty, comati, hairy persons, i. e. those who are endowed with strength. The champions in battle are meant, who by their prowess and valor preceded the people." — Ta.]

the people's great act of self-devotion, when whole tribes give themselves to God, — their hair streaming, their hearts rejoicing, — and place their strength and trust in Him. They were the καρποκόμενοι<sup>1</sup> of a divine freedom. This interpretation also brings the parallelism out clearly: בְּפָרֵי stands in both causal and appositional correlation with בְּהִרְבֵּיבָה. The preposition בְּ points out the condition of the people in which they conquered and sang. The Song is the people's consecration hymn, and praises God for the prosperous and successful issue with which He has crowned their vows. "Praise ye God," it exclaims, "for the long locks," — i. e. for and in the people's consecration. The result of every such consecration as God blesses, is his praise. And now, the nations must hear it! The object of Israel's national pride, is its God. Hence, Israel's song of triumph is a call upon surrounding kings to hear what God did for his people when they gave themselves up to Him.<sup>2</sup>

Ver. 3. Hear, O ye kings and princes. Both are expressions for the "mighty ones" among the nations, cf. Ps. ii. 2. רִיבִים are the great, the strong. Rosen manifestly answers to the Sanskrit vr̥ṣṇa (Benfey, i. 332), Old High German r̥iso, giant. — Deborah proposes not merely to sing, but adds, I will play (תִּנְחֵל). As in the Psalms, singing and playing are joined together, one representing thought, the other sound. The action expressed by תִּנְחֵל, is performed on various instruments (cf. Ps. cxliv. 9, "ten-stringed lute"), chiefly on the cithern, a species of harp or lyre (Ps. xcvi. 5, etc.), but also with timbrels and citherns (Ps. cxlix. 3, cf. Ps. lxxxi. 3). Miriam also accompanied her antiphonal song with timbrels (tympans, Ex. xv. 20), Jephthah's daughter used them as she came to meet her father (Judg. xi. 34). Nor can they have failed as an accompaniment to the Song of our prophetess. Tympana (toph, timbrels) appear in antiquity as the special instrument of impassioned women (Creuzer, Symbolik, iii. 489).

The derivation of the word תִּנְחֵל is not clear. Delitzsch is doubtless right in deciding (Psalter, i. 19) that it has nothing to do with the samar which signifies to "prune the vine." That samar reminds one of the Greek σάλας, a clasp and carving-knife. Simmer, to play (scil. mismor, ψαλμός), distinguishes itself as an onomatopoeic word. The primitive Greek singer, whose contest with the muses in cithern-playing Homer already relates, was named Thamyris (Il. ii. 594).

Ver. 4, 5. O God at thy march from Seir. An Israelitish song can praise God only by rehearsing the history of Israel. For the fact that God is in its history constitutes the sole foundation of Israel's national existence and rights over against other nations. But this immanence of God in the history of the people, manifests itself most wonderfully in those events through which, as by steps, Israel became a nation. For not in Egypt, where Israel was a servant, was the nation born, nor through the exodus alone; the nationality of Israel is the child of the desert. There, through the self-revelation of God, Israel became a free people. The journey through the desert — of which Sinai was the central point, — by the giving of the law and the impartation of doctrine, by the wonderful provision of food and the gift of victory, and by the infliction of awful judgments, became one continuous act of divine revelation. Thus, Israel came forth from the desert a perfected nation. The prophetic insight of the Hebrew poets, at one clear glance, traces the desert-birth of the nation back to the manifest nearness of God as its cause. All that happened to the people came from God. "The Lord came from Sinai," says the Song of Moses (Deut. xxxiii. 2), "and rose up from Seir; He shined forth from Mount Paran." The 114th psalm (ver. 2) represents the exodus from Egypt as the beginning of Israel's nationality: "Then Judah became his sanctuary." Deborah takes Seir and Edom, whence Israel entered history as a nation, as representatives of the whole desert; which from her position was, even geographically, quite natural. The 68th Psalm, borrowing from this passage, at the same time explains it by substituting more general terms for Seir and Edom: "When thou wentest forth before thy people, when thou didst march through the wilderness." The wilderness was the theatre of the revelation of God. There He appeared to his people. Where is there another nation to whom this occurred? "Hear, ye kings," cries the prophetess, what nation was ever raised up, instructed, and led, by the manifest presence of such a God?

The earth trembled. The superior grandeur of Scriptural over the noblest Hellenic conceptions, is scarcely anywhere more clearly apparent. The earthquake, with Hesiod and others, is symbolic of conflict between the powers above and those below, between Zeus and Typhon: —

"Great Olympus trembled beneath the immortal feet Of the Ruler rising up, and hollow groaned the earth."

The earth resounded, and the heavens around, and the floods of ocean."<sup>4</sup>

To the prophetic spirit of Deborah, also, and of the Psalms, the earthquake becomes a powerful symbol; but it is the symbol of the creature's

<sup>1</sup> ["Long-haired," cf. the Homeric καρποκόμενοι Ἀχαιοί, "long-haired Greeks," Il. ii. 11, etc. Among the later Greeks, long hair was the badge of freedom, and hence was not allowed to slaves. See Smith's Diet. Antiquities, s. v. "Coma." — Ta.]

<sup>2</sup> [Dr. Bachmann adopts the view of ver. 2 given by the LXX. according to the Alexandrine Codex: ἐν ᾧ ἡγήσαντο ἀρχαγοὶ ἐν Ἰσραὴλ, and translates, "that the leaders led," etc. The idea of "leading" or "going before," he says, may be readily derived from the radical meaning of פָּרַע, "to break forth," sc. into prominence (hervorbrechen). His criticism on our author's translation is as follows: "To say nothing of the fact that the participle (?) יִשְׁרָאֵל excites surprise, standing as it does in parallelism with עַם, it may well be doubted whether the expression taken in this sense would ever have been intelligible, notwithstanding the alleged explanatory apposition of the second member of the verse; at all events, in the language of the law פָּרַע denotes, not an act, but a condition (the consequence of the מַעַר לִי יַעֲבֹר, Num. vi. 5), such as at the beginning of the fulfilment of a vow of consecration — and to a beginning the reference would have to be here, — could have no existence." — Ta.]

humility and awe on account of the sacred nearness of God. For Israel's sake, God descended from on high; the creature knows its Lord, and trembles. The earth trembles,<sup>1</sup> and "the heavens pour." (In the desert peninsula of Sinai the latter is a wonder. Even at this day, the Bedouins cherish the superstition that Moses had in his possession the book which determines the fall of rain.) The heavens lose their brazen aridity; whatever is hard and unyielding, firm as rock and stone, becomes soft and liquid;<sup>2</sup> the mountains stagger, the rocks flow down like water (לִשְׁרָרָה). The earthquake-belt that girdles the Mediterranean afforded numerous instances of such phenomena. Tremendous masses of rock have been shaken down from Mount Sinai by earthquakes (Ritter xiv. 601, etc.). Even this Sinai. That is, Sinai especially, Sinai before all others is the mountain that shook when God descended, according to the statement, Ex. xix. 18; "and the whole mount quaked greatly." Thunders rolled and heavy clouds hung upon its summit (Ex. xix. 16). "The mountains saw thee," says Habakkuk (ch. iii. 10), "and they trembled; the overflowing of the waters passed by." "What ailed you, ye mountains, that ye trembled like lambs?" asks the Psalmist, Ps. cxiv. 6: "Before the Lord the earth trembled, before the God of Jacob."

These introductory ascriptions of praise to God, have no reference to the battle at the Kishon. They magnify the power and majesty of Israel's God, as manifested in the nation's earlier history. Such is the God of Israel, the nations are told. Such is He who has chosen Israel for his people. It was there in the desert that they became his; and for that reason the poet selects the scenes of the desert as the material of her praise. She speaks with great brevity: the 68th Psalm amplifies her conceptions. Very unfortunate is the conjecture (Böttger) that by Sinai Tabor is meant. It is altogether at variance with the spirit of the old covenant, which could never consent to make Sinai the representative of any less sacred mountain. Moreover, the battle was not on Tabor, but in the plain, near the Kishon. With ver. 5 closes that part of the Song by which the "kings and princes" are informed that the God whom the elements fear, has become the Lord of Israel. With ver. 6 the poetess first enters on the history of the state of affairs which existed in Israel previous to her great deed.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 6.—On this translation of  $\text{בְּיָמֵי}$ , compare the author's remarks below. The justification they attempt, is, however, too forced and artificial to be satisfactory. The passages cited in its support, are rather against it. For in Num. xiv. 11, it is the very fact that Israel's unbelief exists contemporaneously, in the presence, as it were, of mighty wonders, that makes it so culpable. And so in the passages cited from Isaiah (ch. v. 26; lx. 11 (12); x. 4), it is the continuance of Jehovah's anger while surrounded, so to speak, by the terrible evidences of previous punitive inflictions, that gives it its full dreadfulness. It seems necessary, therefore, to take  $\text{בְּיָמֵי}$  here in the sense of "in," "during." It is necessary, further, to place Shamgar not in, but after, the eighty years' rest procured by Ehud, cf. on ch. iii. 31; for while the "land rested," such a state of affairs as Deborah here describes cannot have existed. He belongs to the period of the Canaanite oppression in the north, and fought against the Philistines who rose up in the south (so Bachmann and others). A single exploit is told of him; and the comparatively inferior position assigned him in the Book of Judges, seems to warrant the conclusion that it was the only remarkable deed he did. That deed, however, was one which would make him universally known and held up as a great hero. Deborah seizes on this popular estimate of Shamgar, in order by contrast to heighten the glory of the divine deliverance just achieved. Such was your condition when your great hero lived, she says: but now, behold, what hath God wrought!—The words  $\text{בְּיָמֵי יֵאֵל}$ , "in the days of Jael," contain another difficulty. It must strike every one as inappropriate that one who, so far as we know, had only now become famous, and that by a deed of deliverance, namely, Jael, the slayer of Sisera, should be connected with the past misery. Dr. Cassel's suggestion that  $\text{יֵאֵל}$  is to be taken as a surname or popular designation of some hero (see below), becomes therefore exceedingly attractive. But according to our view of  $\text{בְּיָמֵי}$ , the hero thus designated cannot be Ehud, but must be Shamgar — Ta.]

[2 Ver. 7 —  $\text{בְּיָמֵי}$ . Gesenius and Fürst define this word as properly meaning, "rule, dominion;" here, concrete for

"rulers, leaders." So also Bertheau, De Wette, Bunsen, and similarly many previous expositors and versions: LXX., Cod. Vat. ἡγεμόνες, al. codd. of ἡγεμόνες (Cod. Al. simply transfers the word, and writes ἡγεμόνες); It. Vera potentes, Vulg. fortes. This undoubtedly yields a good sense; but, as Bachmann points out, it rests on a meaning of the root פָּרַץ, which although belonging to it in Arabic, it does not practically have in Hebrew. Moreover, it appears to be a hasty proceeding to separate פָּרַץ from פָּרַץ in signification, if not (as Fürst does) in root-relations. Accordingly, Bachmann and Keil, like our author and others, explain פָּרַץ by פָּרַץ, and make it mean the "open country," or "the unwall'd cities or villages of the open country." In this they only follow the Targum, Peshito, most of the Rabbins, and many earlier and later expositors. The form of the word shows that it is properly an abstract, cf. Ges. Gr. 88, 2; 84, 15; Ewald, 163, b, d. Keil and Cassel make it apply in the concrete to the cities, villages, or hamlets, Bachmann to the population, of the open country (Landvolk). The connection of the passage, he thinks, requires a personal, not local, signification; for as ver. 8 a corresponds to (or rather gives the ground of) ver. 6 c d, so ver. 7 a (the cessation of פָּרַץ) must correspond to ver. 8 b (the absence of shield and spear). He further argues that as in ver. 2, 7 b, and 8 b, יִשְׂרָאֵל refers to the people of Israel, it must also refer to them in ver. 7 a; and, finally, that the signification "rural population," is more suitable in ver. 11. The ultimate result is the same whether one or the other interpretation be adopted; yet, as Bachmann's arguments do not appear to have much force, and as the immediately preceding mention of highways leads the mind to think of local centres of population rather than of the population itself, we prefer to interpret villages or hamlets. — Ta.

[3 Ver. 8. — Dr. Cassel's translation conforms more closely to the original: Gewählt hatten sie neue Götter, — "they had chosen new gods." The above English rendering was adopted in order to reproduce the alliteration of the German. — Ta.]

[4 Ver. 8. — וְאָז לָחֵם שָׁעָרַי: literally, "then war (was at the) gates." לָחֵם is best explained as a verbal noun from piel, the vowel of the final syllable of the absolute לָחֵם being shortened because of the close connection with the following word, and the retraction of the tone being omitted on account of the toneless initial syllable of שָׁעָרַי (Bertheau, Keil, Bachmann). שָׁעָרַי may be genitive (in which case לָחֵם must be in the construct state) or accusative of place, which is more simple. — Ta.]

[5 Ver. 8. — אִם יִרְאוּ. According to Keil and others אִם introduces a negative interrogatory. But as אִם with simple, direct questions is rare, cf. Ges. Gr. 158, 2, Bachmann prefers to regard it as the אִם of obtestation: "If shield or spear were seen!" i. e. they were not seen. So also Bertheau, Gesenius, Fürst (in their Lexicons), and many others. — Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Vers. 6-8. After the days of Shamgar, בְּיָמֵי שָׁמְגָר. The difficulty of the passage can scarcely be removed, if, as is usually done, the preposition בְּ be taken in the sense of "in," "during." During the days of Shamgar such misery cannot have come upon Israel. The narrator could not in that case have said of him, ch. iii. 31, that he "delivered Israel," just as (ver. 15) he speaks of Ehud as a "deliverer." If Shamgar was no deliverer, how can it be said "and after him (or like him, i. e. Ehud, cf. on ch. iii. 31) was Shamgar?" It seems impossible to assume (as nevertheless Keil also does), that the poetess could say of the days of such a hero, that there was no resistance and defense, no sword or shield, in Israel. The disparaging connection in which, were this assumption true, it would please her to exhibit the hero, is also wholly at variance with her spirit. To this must be added that, as was above shown to be probable, Shamgar's famous exploit and further activity fall within the eighty years of "rest" after Ehud. At all events, Shamgar's fame is related before the time in which Israel again begins to sin, and consequently again falls into servitude. It cannot therefore be otherwise understood, than that Deborah retraces the misery of her people up to the time of this last hero. "Since the days of Shamgar," i. e. upon and after his days, the highways began to be deserted.<sup>1</sup>

Philologically, this form of expression is not without analogies. God says (Num. xiv. 11), "They believe not me, בְּכָל הַמַּעֲשִׂים," in, i. e. after "all the wonders I have done among them." In the same manner we are to interpret בְּכָל in several passages of Isaiah (ch. ix. 11 (12); v. 25; x. 4): "the Syrians and Philistines devour Israel, — in all that, after all that, notwithstanding all that, his anger is not turned away." Thus the sense of our passage also becomes clear. Notwithstanding that the days of Shamgar have been, i. e. after them, misery began. His heroic deed against the Philistines, was the last great act performed by Israel. But the author adds, "in, after, the days of Jael." That this cannot be the stout-hearted woman who slew Sisera, is self-evident, since Deborah, speaking of her contemporary, could not say "in the days of Jael." But apart from this, the Song itself (ver. 24) distinguishes this Jael by carefully designating her as the "wife of Heber, the Kenite." Moreover, Jael is properly a man's name. The other assumption, however, that Jael was a Judge, who lived before Deborah's time, rests on slender foundations. It is utterly inconceivable that the narrator, who communicates the Song of Deborah, had he so understood it, would not have told us something of this Judge Jael. He would at all events have inserted his name, at least in some such manner as that of Shamgar himself, of Elon the Zebulonite, and of Abdon (Judg. xii. 11-15), of

<sup>1</sup> The use of בְּ in, in the sense of upon — after, cannot be considered surprising, when the poetical freedom of the language is taken into account. Even our German auf ("upon" or "on"), of which Grimm says that in many cases it has appropriated the meaning of in, affords an instance of the same kind. To pass by other examples, we also say with equal propriety, "in vielen Tagen" (in many days), and "nach vielen Tagen" (after many days), not only when the reference is to the future, but even when it is to the past. — Although Shamgar slew the Philistines with an ox-goad, that fact cannot explain the non-employment of sword and lance in ver. 8 of the Song; for, as Barak's heroes show (ch. iv. 16), there is no want of weapons, but of courage to use them.

whom nothing is reported beyond the general fact that they judged Israel. The only remaining supposition, and one fully accordant with the poetic cast of the Song, is, that Jael was the knightly surname of Shamgar, or even more probably of Ehud. We know that Gideon is frequently mentioned by his heroic name Jerubbaal, and that Samson is simply styled Bedan (1 Sam. xii. 11). That Jael might readily become the beautiful popular designation of a man so determined and rapid in his movements as Ehud, is evident, whether we take it to mean the Mountain-climber, the August One, the Prince, or the Rock-goat, whose facile ascent to the most inaccessible rocky heights is astonishing. Most probably, however, the name is connected with the word הוֹצִיל, to help. The same word, which is often used negatively concerning heathen gods (לֹא יוֹצִיל), "they help not," 1 Sam. xii. 21, Jer. ii. 8, etc.), is here employed positively to denote one who was a "Helper" of Israel in distress. The sense, moreover, becomes thus perfectly clear: "After the days of Shamgar, after the days of Jael (Ehud)," the people perished through their sins; that is, as ch. iv. 1 asserts, and ver. 8 of this chapter confirms, — "they had chosen themselves new gods."

The highways were deserted, חֳדָלּוּ אֶתְדַרְחוֹ: literally, they ceased to be highways. No one travelled on the public roads, because there was no security. The enemy plundered all through the country. He who was obliged to travel, sought out concealed by-paths, in order to elude the tyrant and his bands. These few lines give a striking picture of a land languishing under hostile oppression. חֳדָלּוּ פְּרוֹזוֹן, open places, hamlets, ceased to exist. פְּרוֹזוֹן is the open country, in distinction from cities surrounded by walls and gates. One imagines himself to be reading a description of the condition of Germany in the 10th century, when the Magyars invaded the land (cf. Widukind, Sächs. Gesch. i. 32). Henry I. is celebrated as a builder of cities, especially because by fortifying open villages he rendered them more secure than formerly against the enemy. All ancient expositors, Greek as well as Chaldee and later Rabbinic, consent to this explanation or פְּרוֹזוֹן (cf. Schnurrer, p. 46). Ver. 8 also agrees with it: no place without walls was any longer secure against the hostile weapons of those who oppressed Israel; the conflict was pushed even to the very gates of the mountain fortresses. The attempt to make the word mean "princes," "leaders," labors under great difficulties; which modern expositors, almost all of whom have adopted it, have by no means overcome. It raises an internal contradiction to connect חֳדָלּוּ with פְּרוֹזוֹן, when taken in this sense. We can very properly say לִקְבִיבֵי חֳדָלּוּ, "the hungry cease to be such," but not "princes." Of a banished dynasty there is no question. A Judge there was not; none therefore could cease to be. The lack of military virtue is first mentioned in ver. 8. Situated as Israel was, the misery of the people might be measured by the extent to which their fields and rural districts were devastated and rendered insecure. As to their "princes," their hereditary chiefs, they in fact still existed. Nor does the form of the word need any correction (cf. ver. 11).

Till I arose (עַד שֶׁקָּמָתִי) for a mother in Israel: who, as it were, bore Israel anew. It was the regeneration of Israel's nationality that was secured at the Kishon. How came it about (she adds, ver. 8), that Israel had so fallen as to need a new mother? They had chosen "new gods" for themselves. The eternal God, before whom the mountains trembled, Him they had forsaken. Hence the loss of all their strength. They were hard pressed, up to the very gates of their fortresses. (לָחֶם is not simply war, but an already victorious and consuming oppression.) Resistance in the open field there was none anywhere. Among forty thousand not one sought safety by means of sword and shield.<sup>8</sup> The poet says "new gods," not "other gods." The objective idea is of course the same, but not the subjective thought as here entertained. For Israel had from of old its everlasting God, — Him whose glory the poem had delineated at the outset. But instead of that God, Israel chose them new gods, whom they had not formerly known. There is a profoundly significant connection of thought between this passage and the Song of Moses, Deut. xxxii. 17. There the thought, which is here implied, lies fully open: "They shall sacrifice to gods whom they never knew, to new gods, that came newly up, whom their fathers feared not." The heathen gods of Canaan are in truth all new to Israel; for their own God had already chosen them in the desert, before ever they set foot in the land. Israel's recent ruin was the consequence of their serving these new gods. That all manliness had vanished, that servitude prevailed up to the gates of their fortresses, that they were shut out from highway, hamlet, and fountain, was the bitter fruit of their unfaithfulness to their ancient God. Nor was deliverance possible, until, as the result of Deborah's efforts, the people became regenerated by means of the ancient truth.

chosen new things." But ver. 8 itself opposes this construction, to say nothing of the contradiction which it involves with the whole course of thought. To adopt Kemink's correction, הָיָה, "God chose women," would only increase the distortion of the hymn, which even without this would arise from the change of subject. That not Elohim, but Jehovah, would be used, were God the subject, is remarked by Bertheau (p. 88), who in his turn, however, unfortunately gives a wrong sense to Elohim.

<sup>2</sup> [Wordsworth: "Until that I Deborah arose. Deborah, as an inspired person, looks at herself from an external point of view, and speaks of herself objectively, considering all her acts as due, not to herself, but to the Spirit of God. She does not praise herself, but blesses God who acted in her: so did Moses (see Num. xii. 8), and so Samuel (1 Sam. xii. 11). — Tr.]

<sup>8</sup> Isolated interpretations of the Middle Ages, taken up by a few moderns, find the subject in Elohim, as if "God had

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Ver. 9. Deborah had delineated, first, the glorious majesty of God; then, in contrast therewith, the ruin which overtook Israel because it forsook Him, and chose new gods who cannot help, till she arose, a mother in Israel. With that she returns to the beginning. For what had she done? She had called on the people to turn back, and consecrate themselves to God. When everything lay prostrate, Barak and his faithful followers had taken the vows of God upon themselves. If Deborah had become a "strong one" (gibbor) in Israel, so had those who followed her inspiring call. If she speaks of herself as Deliverer, it is not without including those to whom she imparted her faithful and courageous "heart." Ver. 9 resumes ver. 2. The ground of all her praise, is that Israel turned again to God. This had been stated in ver. 2; here, by way of farther transition from ver. 7, she adds the expression "my heart:" she has infused the new spirit into Israel. She has imparted her heart to the people, as a mother to her children. The "heart" is the seat of divine inspirations and hopes; it is the organ that praises, desires, and seeks after God. The contents of Deborah's heart flowed over into Israel. "If thou wilt go with me," says Barak, "then I will go." "My heart," she exclaims, "was with the orderers of Israel," with those who devoted themselves, so that they devoted themselves as יְהוָה of Israel.<sup>1</sup> The explanation of יְהוָה has been thought more difficult than it is. It has already been remarked above, that the duty of a Judge was to execute the mishpat, the law of Israel, according to the ordinances of Moses. Whenever a Judge reintroduced the observance of the law, divine order sprang up anew among the people. Now, יְהוָה and מִשְׁפָּט are ever conjoined (cf. Ex. xv. 25). "What nation is there," asks Deut. iv. 8, "that has such chukkim and mishpatim?" "Hear, O Israel," reiterates Moses, in Deut. v. 1, "the chukkim and mishpatim which I speak in your ears." "Joshua made a covenant with the people (Josh. xxiv. 25), and set them chok and mishpat." What the Shophet is for the mishpat, that the Chokek is for the chok. Both words have the same

[In this sentence our author seems to combine two different explanations of יְהוָה, etc., namely: 1. I imparted my spirit to the "Orderers" of Israel, by virtue of which they became such; and, 2. My heart loves those who proved grammatical form; both have the same historical relations. Whoever watched over the chok of Israel, was a chokek. They were the Orderers of Israel; for chok is the "order" resulting from law. The men who followed Deborah, the leaders of the people, who staked their lives for Israel's nationality in God, were not shophetim, — for that word was already used in a definitely restricted sense; but to the name chokekim, which the prophetess gives them, they were justly entitled. They were men of law and national order.

Ver. 10. Praise God. The Song of Deborah is a hymn of praise to God; praise forms the keynote to all its variations. The refrain of ver. 2 is here repeated, because the thought of ver. 2 has come up in a new form. The arrangement of the poem is delicate and beautiful. Ver. 2 called on all to praise God. Thereupon she herself began to sing, ver. 3: "I will praise;" her own personality comes to view in her song of God, and again in the saving power through which she became a mother of Israel. From ver. 9 she transfers the work of praise to others. The self-devotion of "her heart" had communicated itself to the people. "Praise God," she resumes; but now, they are to sing who have been delivered, and enjoy the fruits of victory. The whole Song is a hymn of freedom. How extreme and miserable was the recent oppression! The country was full of danger, intercourse interrupted, life enslaved. But now everything is free again. Every kind of movement is practicable. The highways are secure. Therefore, praise is to employ all who enjoy this return of rest. Whoever now is able to travel, without being hindered, robbed, or put in peril of his life, is to thank God who restored him this privilege. They who can ride, rest, or walk in peace again — for now animals are not stolen, tents are not plundered, foot-travellers are not murdered, — are to know and proclaim the preciousness of this new blessing. It is the habit of Biblical writers to comprehend the various movements of persons under the terms "walking, standing, and sitting" (cf. Ps. i. 1). Here, where the freedom of the open country is spoken of, riding is naturally mentioned in the place of standing, which was included in the other expressions. The riders are represented as riding on אֲהֲנֹת צִהְרֹת. To themselves "Orderers," etc. The latter explanation, merely hinted at by Dr. Cassel, is that commonly adopted by expositors. Bachmann remarks that if the first idea had been intended, it would have been more clearly expressed. — Ta.]

ride on asses, was certainly a well-known custom (cf. Judg. x. 4; xii. 14); but the mention of "white," or as it is commonly rendered, "white-dappled" asses, would not be very suitable. Even though the connection of the word צִדְרוֹת with those roots which signify "to glisten," should be finally established, still it will always seem more appropriate to refer it to the beautiful, ornamented coverings that served for saddles. But there seems to be also a philological affinity between tsachar and what the Greeks and Romans called σάγμα, σάγη, sagma,<sup>1</sup> and the Germans saumsattel (pack-saddle). Asses, we know, carried burdens: provisions, corn, wine, etc. (Gen. xlii. 25; xlv. 23; 1 Sam. xxv. 18; cf. Bochart, Hieroz. i. 184). They are to this day the important beast of burden in Palestine; and to leave the ass unladen, even on steep mountain paths, is considered injurious (Ritter, xvii. 295). The Targum (Jonathan), in its rendering of Lev. xv. 9, uses the word סָגָה; for נָפִי, and not נָפִי, is to be read in its text at that place (a fact overlooked by Sachs, Beiträge zur Sprachf., note 2, 196). The thought suggests itself naturally that restored freedom and security must have been of special value to those who transported important and costly articles. The passage becomes peculiarly significant, if brought into connection with the safety of traffic and intercourse, consequent upon the enemy's destruction. — And sit on mats. Since here also the blessings of freedom are the subject of discourse, those only can be meant who were accustomed to sojourn in tents and tent-villages. "To spread the covering," and "to pitch the tent," are to this day equivalent expressions. "To sit on cloths," was the poetic phrase for dwelling in the open country, in hamlets, oases, and on highways, without needing the protection of walls and fortifications. מַטֵּי (mats) is undoubtedly a plural of מִטָּה, garment. It is in keeping with the make of ancient, especially of oriental dress, that the various terms for garment, covering, cloth, are more indefinite and interchangeable than in modern times.<sup>2</sup> Such, for instance, is the case with מִטָּה, garment (Num. iv.

6-13); compare also מִטָּה, covering (Deut. xxii. 12). For the establishment of this general signification of מִטָּה, Teller has rendered meritorious service. In a manuscript note in a copy of his "Note Critique," now in my possession, he directs attention to ματρίον as a cognate word. At all events, that also has the double sense of garment and covering, or cloth. The same, as is well known, is the case with vestis and vestis. The word, mats (Latin, matia), in the translation above, is used merely for the sake of assonance; a philological connection between it and the Hebrew word is not discoverable. — הִלְכִי עַל-דְּרָוִי, foot-travellers, on the proper public roads. They too are no longer driven to seek winding paths. All, whether they ride, sit, or walk, have become free. Therefore, sing praise to God! שִׁירָה, to celebrate in song, as the Psalmist uses it (Ps. cxlv. 5): "Words of thy wonders will I sing" (שִׁירָה).

Ver. 11. The prophetess continues to depict the wonderful change from servitude to freedom. While the enemy had the upper hand, there was security only within the gates; up to the threshold of these, the inhabitants were hunted and pursued. A lively conception of such a condition of society, may be obtained from the history of Germany from the 13th to the 16th century, when it often happened that large cities were at war with their neighbors. In Palestine, cities being built on hill-tops, water must be procured outside of the gates. It was at a well, at the time of water-drawing (Gen. xxiv. 11), that Eliezer met Rebecca, coming out of the city. In time of war, this water-drawing was a dangerous occupation. The crowd was great, and every one wished to be the first to get away. Consequently, there was no lack of contention and vociferation. How all that is changed! Now the maidens draw leisurely and merrily, praising God the while, who has restored quiet and security. The philological explanation agrees perfectly with this exposition. Verse 11 does not depend on ver. 10; it introduces a new thought.

מִלְחָמָה is to be taken or read as מִלְחָמָה, i. e. as participle of the piel מִלְחָה, to strive, quarrel, rizari (cf. Num. xxvi. 9; Ps. lx. 2; etc.), connected with the niphil מִלְחָה, often used of persons who strive and contend with each other (Deut. xxv. 11; Ex. ii. 13; etc.).<sup>3</sup> The "voice" of those who thus contend is wont to attract attention; and a voice is now also heard: יָרָם, שָׁם, there they sing aloud, there resounds the song of those who praise the mercy of God. יָרָם from יָרָה, piel, imperfect, 3d person, plural, to sound, to sing; Sanskrit, śāna, śānos, German öfen. The harsh voice of contention is replaced by the sounds of praise. The burden of this praise! The benefits of God — the benefits which his all-disposing arm has bestowed on Israel, in that, after their self-surrender and return to Him, He has made them free again from the enemy. The consequence of his interposition is מִלְחָמָה, freedom: Israel is free again, and no longer depends on walls for safety. מִלְחָמָה is derived from מִלְחָה, just as מִלְחָמָה from מִלְחָה. It contains the notion of that which is free, of freedom, as it is expressed by the prophet Zechariah, quite in the spirit of our Song, when he says from מִלְחָה, an arrow, and would mean "archers;" so Bertheau, Keil, and many other interpreters, both ancient and modern. Many, perhaps most expositors, however, prefer the direct derivation from מִלְחָה, to divide, but with various modifications of the radical idea. For a full discussion of the word and the interpretations it has received, see Bachmann, i. pp. 851-859; it must suffice here to say that he translates it, Bruteiltheilenden, "those who divide the spoil." They (he explains) who frequent the places of drawing water are to praise the righteous acts of Jehovah, with the joyful voice of those who divide the spoil, cf. Isa. ix. 2 (3). — Ta.]

<sup>2</sup> The same may be said of the use of the articles themselves. The popular custom of spreading out garments, like carpets or cloths, for persons to ride or walk over, is sufficiently familiar from the history of our Lord and the usages of both Greeks and Romans.

(chapter ii. 8, 9 (4, 5)): "Jerusalem shall dwell open (פָּתוּחָהּ, i. e. without walls); and I, saith the Lord, will be unto her a wall of fire round about." When Israel devotes itself to God, it is at rest; accordingly, after the deeds of the several Judges are related, it is constantly added, "and the land had rest." Then enemies are powerless; exposed hamlets are secure; God is their protection. There, at the cisterns, they praise the goodness of God which manifests itself in this newly recovered freedom.

When the people of God hastened down to the gates. Here also the beauty of the internal arrangement of the Song comes prominently to view. Verse 8 says, they chose themselves new gods, אֱלֹהִים לָהֶם שְׁפָרִים; verse 9—interrupted by the praise of God, but resumed in the last line of ver.

<sup>1</sup> (Kell and others connect the last clause of ver. 11, not with ver. 9; but with the immediately preceding praise for victory. "After this victory," says Kell, "the people descended again to its gates, from the mountains and hiding-places whither it had betaken itself for safety from the

When the people apostatized, they were pressed up to their very gates, and fled; when, by self-surrender, they became a people of God, they rushed boldly down to the gates and through them. The consequence of the first was flight; that of the second, impetuous attack.<sup>1</sup> In the former case, among forty thousand there was not a man capable of making resistance; in the latter—and here with the Song enters on the delineation of the conflict,—it was a small band who threw themselves upon the mighty. In vers. 9-11 the prophetess, by praising God for freedom, interrupted the progress of her Song's narrative, just as she does in vers. 3-5 and in ver. 12, to which and the following verses we now pass on.

Vers. 12-23.

- 12 Awake, awake Deborah!
Awake, awake, compose the song!
Barak, arise!—conquer thy conquest,
Thou son of Abinoam!
- 13 Then down against the robust rushed a remnant,
The People of God rushed with me against the powerful.<sup>1</sup>
- 14 From Ephraim's stock, the victors of Amalek;

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 13. — This rendering of ver. 13 supposes the Hebrew text to be pointed and divided thus :

אֵין יָרֵד שָׁרִיד לְאַדְרָם
 עִם יְהוָה יָרֵד לִי בְּגִבּוֹרִים :

So also the LXX. (in Cod. Vat.) and many expositors. The most serious objection to it is, that as it is the easier reading, the Masorites must have had strong traditional grounds for preferring one more difficult. The verse has been translated and interpreted in a great variety of ways ; but the view of Dr. Cassel commends itself strongly, especially when compared with ch. iv. 14. Our English version seems to take יָרֵד as imperf. apoc. Piel from יָרַד, after the example of several Jewish grammarians and interpreters. — Ta.]

[2 Ver. 14. — Dr. Cassel's rendering of the first line of ver. 14 — כֹּנֵי אֶפְרַיִם שָׁרִישׁ בְּעַמְלֵקָה — is, Ass Ephraim's Ari, die Amaleksträger. It does not clearly appear how he would translate the passage literally, but the following would probably express his view : " Out of Ephraim (came) their root (who were) against Amalek." The "root," then, according to our author's exposition (see below), would be Joshua, in his relation to those whom he led to victory against "Amalek." So far as שָׁרִישׁ is concerned, this interpretation has full as much in its favor as that which makes it mean "dwelling-place." On the rendering of עַמְלֵקָה, see the commentary. The majority of expositors, would probably accept the rendering of the two lines given by Dr. Robinson (Bibl. Repos. 1881) : —

"Out of Ephraim (came those) whose dwelling is by Amalek ;

After thee (was) Benjamin among thy hosts."

But in a document the language of which is so obscure as that of the Song of Deborah, much necessarily depends on the conception formed of the connection in which one passage stands with another. Now, while the majority of interpreters assume that ver. 14 speaks of such as took part in the war against Jabin and Sisera, our author maintains that it dwells on the fame of those who did not take part in this war, in order by this comparison to exalt that of those who did. On the decision of this question the interpretation in detail of the whole verse depends. Which of the two conflicting views is true, is not a matter to be discussed here, but it is certain that ch. iv. is very favorable to our author's side, cf. the com. below. — Ta.]

[3 Ver. 14. — The rendering of this line turns on שָׁרֵשׁ כֹּהֵן. The Targum, Peshito, and most ancient expositors, explain it of the "stylus of the writer ;" while most moderns translate it "the staff of the leader." Compare the remarks in the preceding note. — Ta.]

[4 Ver. 15. — Dr. Cassel probably reads שָׁרִי, with Bertheau, Kell, and most expositors. The preposition שָׁ after the construct state is not unusual in poetry, cf. 2 Sam. i. 21 ; Job xviii. 2 ; etc. Some regard שָׁרִי as an unusual plural (cf. Ges. Gram. 87, 1, c), or as an archaic form of the construct (so Ewald, Gram. 211, c). — Ta.]

[5 Ver. 15. — On בְּרִנְלִי, compare "Grammatical" note on ch. iv. 10 ; also ch. viii. 5 ; 2 Sam. xv. 17 ; etc. — Ta.]

[6 Ver. 15. — לִבְּךָ וְחַיִּי לָב ; Dr. Cassel, Bygründler. For וְחַיִּי לָב, in the next verse, he has Bygründler, which admirably reproduces both the paranomasia and the irony of the original. וְחַיִּי and וְחַיִּי are, of course, abstract nouns, followed by the genitive of the subject to which they pertain. — Ta.]

[7 Ver. 17. — "Aber Dan, was zogst du auf Schiffen aus !" Our author probably takes דָּן in its most usual sense, "to sojourn ;" to sojourn in or on ships, readily suggesting the idea of sailing in ships. Most expositors translate : "And Dan, why abides he at the ships ?" The prepositionless accusative is as easy or as difficult in one case as in the other. — Ta.]

[8 Ver. 19. — מַצֵּעַ תְּקָהָן : Dr. Cassel, Geld zur Buße, "penance money," cf. the Commentary below. Bertheau, Kell, and others, taking מַצֵּעַ in its Arabic sense of frustum (cf. the root בָּצַע), translate : "not a piece of silver did they take ;" but against the Hebrew use of the word. — Ta.]

[9 Ver. 20. — Dr. Cassel, following many previous expositors, alters the Masoretic text division by transferring "the stars" from the second to the first clause. But it is justly objected to this change that it reduces the second clause to a mere repetition by which nothing is added to the idea already expressed in the first. In the next line, the word קִסְלֵה signifies, "a causeway," "highway." Dr. Cassel's rendering, Stetten, places, is manifestly chosen for the sake of alliteration : Sie stritten von ihren Stetten mit Sisera ; compare the English imitation above. — Ta.]

[10 Ver. 21 — הַדְרִי בְּפִשִּׁי עֹז. This line has been very variously interpreted. It is now generally agreed, however, that it is an address of the Singer to herself. הַדְרִי is the jussive of the second person, cf. Ges. Gram. 48, 4. עֹז may either be taken as an adverbial accusative (= בְּעֹז), or as the direct object after the verb. Dr. Cassel decides for the former, after Herder, Justi, Bertheau, Ewald, Kell ; Dr. Bachmann, with Schnurrer, Köhler, Holmann, etc., prefers the latter, and takes עֹז as the abstract for the concrete : "Tread down, my soul, the strong ones !" cf. Robbins, in Bibl. Sacra. In either case, the incitement of the line may be directed to the continuation of the Song, or to the prosecution of the pursuit of the enemy. Bachmann prefers the latter; but the former seems to us more striking and appropriate. — Tr.]

[11 Ver. 22. — Dr. Ossel: —

Der entjüngsten Starben.*

On the translation of וְהָיָה by "when," cf. note 1, on p. 97. In the second line of the above rendering, the וְהָיָה does not come to its rights, and the suffix in וְהָיָה is neglected. The וְהָיָה is causal, and the suffix וְהָיָה goes back to the collective וְהָיָה of the first line, so that it seems necessary to explain וְהָיָה of men, not, as our author (see below), of horses. The best rendering of the verse is probably that adopted, for substance, by Kell, Bachmann, and many others: —

"Then the hoofs of the horses smote the ground, Because of the galloping of their valiant riders."

The last expression may very well be taken ironically: "runaway heroes." On the repetition of וְהָיָה, to indicate continuance, see Ewald, Gram., §18 a; cf. also Ges. Gram. 108, 4. — Tr.]

[12 Ver. 23. — On the above translation of ver. 23 it is to be remarked, 1. That the word rendered "ban," is וְהָיָה, and does not, like וְהָיָה, imply the actual destruction of the object against which it is aimed. 2. That with the LXX. (Cod. Vat.) our author transfers וְהָיָה from the second line to the first. On the construction of וְהָיָה (which below, but not here, he changes (with the LXX.) into וְהָיָה), cf. Ges. Gram. 181, 4 b. 3. That the expression "People of God" is our author's interpretation of what is meant by "coming to the help of Jehovah," cf. below. 4. That וְהָיָה is by most recent expositors rendered, "among (or, with) heroes," namely, the warriors of Israel. Compare the Septuagint and Vulgate; the Targum takes וְהָיָה in the hostile sense. — Tr.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Ver. 12. With the words of ver. 11, "when the People of God hastened down to the gates," i. e. out to battle, the prophetess transfers herself into the midst of the conflict. Verse 12 presents a reminiscence of the battle song. It recalls the rallying cry. Wake up! wake up! (עֲרֹץ from עָרַץ, cf. Isa. li. 9.) "Awake, awake!" is addressed to Deborah, urging her to fire the soldiery through her song; "arise!" refers to Barak. For she sang, and Barak fought. וְהָיָה, "lead forth thy captives." To be able to carry away captives, was evidence of a complete victory. When Jerusalem and Samaria fell, the people were carried away prisoners. The captivity of the enemy ends the conflict. The reason why a perpetual ban of destruction was pronounced against the enemies who attacked the host of Israel, in the wilderness, near Arad, was not merely that they fought against Israel, but that they also "took some of them prisoners" (Num. xxi. 1). The completeness of God's victory, as the 68th Psalm celebrates it, is indicated by the expression, ver. 19 (18): וְהָיָה, "thou hast carried away the captives."<sup>1</sup>

Ver. 13. The prophetess now continues to depict the surprising contrasts that have arisen from Israel's return to God. A וְהָיָה, a remaining few, by no means all Israel, but a small band — like the remnant (וְהָיָה) whom, according to the prophet Joel (ch. ii. 32 (iii. 5)), God calls, — takes up the conflict with וְהָיָה, mighty ones. (Cf. my discussion on Ps. viii. 3, in the Lutherischen Zeitschr., 1860. "Mighty kings," וְהָיָה, are slain by God, Ps. cxxxvi. 18). The next line runs parallel with this: "the people of God (וְהָיָה) charges against gibborim." Gibborim are warlike men of gigantic strength. It is applied here to enemies, as elsewhere to Nimrod, who also was an enemy. In the view of Scripture, God alone is the true Gibbor (Deut. x. 17, etc.). Usually, the gibborim conquer; but here the result is that of which Isaiah speaks (ch. xlix. 25), "the captives of the gibbor are taken away from him." There is a peculiar beauty in Deborah's mode of stating her own share in the war: "the People of God rushed for me (וְהָיָה) against heroes." For my sake, she sings, at my call, with me, did they hazard the conflict with men of superior strength.

Vers. 14-16. It was truly a "remnant" that fought at the Kishon against Sisera. It was only a part of all Israel that was entitled to the honor of being styled the "People of God." A special renown must henceforth attach to those tribes who took part in the war, just as the Athenians never lost the glory of having alone gained the battle of Marathon. In Israel, as in Hellas, rivalries obtained between the different tribes. Considerations like these afford the proper introduction to ver. 14. Expositors have made its difficulties altogether insurmountable, by supposing that all the tribes here named assisted Barak.<sup>2</sup> But this supposition is utterly untenable: 1. The statement of ch. iv. is positive and definite, that only Zebulun and Naphtali fought on the plains of Issachar. It is moreover corroborated by the fact that, from her residence on Mount Ephraim, Deborah sends to just those tribes, because the oppression under which Israel suffered bore heaviest on them. 2. The question whether Ephraim and Benjamin took part in the war, could not have been overlooked by the narrator; for the direction of the march which he had to trace was altogether different from what, had they been combatants, it would have been. And why, in that case, would it have been necessary for Deborah to go with Barak to Kedesh? 3. It is contradicted by ver. 14 itself. Machir means

וְהָיָה וְהָיָה. Cf. Judg. vii. 9, וְהָיָה; also Judg. vii. 18.

Gilead proper.<sup>1</sup> Manasseh as a whole cannot be intended by it (cf. the word מַחִיר). It is for the very purpose of designating a part that the term "Machir" is employed. But Deborah herself says, ver. 17, that Gilead did not take part in the campaign. Nor would it be at all apparent why Zebulun should be described by two different attributes (vers. 14 and 18), in relation to the same event. 4. If those tribes took part in the conflict, why does ver. 18 speak only of Zebulun and Naphtali? The Plateans, who alone stood by the Athenians in the day of battle, were not thus forgotten. The most ancient Jewish expositors, however, already perceived the more correct view to be taken of the verse: it is to be historically interpreted. The poet's mind, like the action itself, moves over the northern territory of Israel. The tribes of Judah and Simeon lie altogether beyond her present field of vision. But with the ancient glory of those tribes, whose territories stretched onward from Mount Ephraim — from the spot where she herself resided, near the border of Benjamin, — she compares that of the conquerors whom she led on. Each tribe had its own glorious traditions. No doubt, exclaims the prophetess, Ephraim is renowned, for out of him sprang he who was against Amalek. The ancients rightly understood this of Joshua, the conqueror of Amalek,<sup>2</sup> the pride of Ephraim, who was buried among them, and on whom, unquestionably, the Ephraimites always founded their claim to the leadership among the tribes. — מַחִירֵי

מִצְרַיִם, after thee, Benjamin against thine enemies. Since מִצְרַיִם (Aram. plur. c. suffix) manifestly answers to מִצְרַיִם, the מִצְרַיִם, which with the latter means "against," must be taken in the same sense with the former. This is confirmed by the fact that the plural of מִצְרַיִם is always<sup>3</sup> applied to the "heathen," the "nations," and carries with it the idea of hostility against Israel.

מִצְרַיִם means the hostile nations who stand arrayed against thee, — "thy heathen," so to speak, "thine enemies." "After thee," says the prophetess to Ephraim, "Benjamin advanced against thine enemies" — Benjamin, who bears the name of Wolf (Gen. xlix. 27). It is the fame of Ehud, that renders Benjamin illustrious. The old expositors understood these utterances of Deborah, concerning Benjamin and the other tribes, as prophetic. But such an explanation cannot be accepted. A prophetess who looked into the boundless and indefinite future, could not have compared tribe with tribe in a manner possible only when dealing with the facts of history. — By the side of the warlike fame of Ephraim and Benjamin, the prophetess places the peaceful renown of Machir and Zebulun. How far the sons of Machir distinguished themselves as mechakekim, orderers of the law, we have, it is true, no information. But it is to be noticed that what is told of Jair, Judg. x. 4, connects itself with a Jair who lived as early as the time of Moses (Num. xxxii. 41). The sons of Machir were born "upon the knees" of their grandfather Joseph

(Gen. i. 23). It is only by supposing that the renown of Zebulun also, is one which existed previous to the war, that what is here said can be brought into easy and proper connection with what is said in ver. 18. Zebulun, formerly known only for his מִצְרַיִם עֲשֵׂהְתָּ, experts with the ciphering-pencil, had now become a people courageous unto death. Zebulun was a commercial tribe, like Zidon. The purple-trade especially occupied them. Consequently, the art of the Sopher, i. e. writing, reading, and ciphering, could not fail to be extensively practiced in this tribe. The Sopher appears also in Phœnician inscriptions; Gesenius compares him with the questors of Carthage, who held an office next in importance to that of the Suffetes (Monum. Phœnic., 173). A like important office was held by the Sopherim at the courts of the Jewish kings. They are always named in conjunction with the high-priest (cf. 2 Sam. viii. 17; xx. 25; 1 Kgs. iv. 3; 1 Chron. xviii. 16; Isa. xxxvi. 3; 2 Kgs. xix. 2). The Sopher and the high-priest count the money found in the offering-box, 2 Kgs. xii. 10 (11). King Josiah sends his Sopher Shaphan (יִשְׁפָּן, cf. יִשְׁפָּןִי). Elizaphan, a Zebulunite, Num. xxxiv. 25) to the priest. It is he who reads the sacred book, which the priest has found, to the king (2 Kgs. xxii. 8). The commander-in-chief has a Sopher who enrolls the army (2 Kgs. xxv. 19; Jer. lii. 25). The uncle of David is celebrated as a wise man and a Sopher (1 Chron. xxvii. 32). The Psalmist praises the stylus of a ready Sopher (Ps. xlv. 1 (2)). The activity of a Sopher is everywhere pacific in its nature, demanding sagacity, and presupposing knowledge.

The stylus, מִצְרַיִם, of the Psalmist, is the same as Deborah's מִצְרַיִם, staff. It was an honor to Zebulun, that in the tribe there were able Sopherim, who could make the art which commerce had caused to flourish among them, subserve the internal and higher life of Israel. The word מִצְרַיִם suggests a forcible picture; we see the writer artistically drawing the letters with his stylus. This constituted the ancient renown of the tribe. But the victory with Deborah at the Kishon, will not less highly exalt those who had a part in it. That thought forms the transition to ver. 15. Issachar, it is true, had not shared in the battle; but that did not diminish the significance of the tribe. Their territory was the theatre of the decision. Very much depended upon the attitude they assumed. Were the battle lost, Issachar must first bear the consequences. Nevertheless, their chiefs decided to hearken to Deborah. "The princes in Issachar were with Deborah." They surrounded Deborah, while Barak plunged into the valley. As Moses did not himself take the field against Amalek, but intrusted Joshua with the conduct of the battle while he prayed on the mount, so Deborah stood behind the battle-ranks, surrounded by Issachar, uttering blessings, or in case discouragement showed itself, urging, encouraging, inspiring, in a manner similar perhaps to that which the German women were wont to adopt.<sup>5</sup> It has been well observed that in the expression וַיִּשְׁפֹּר בֶּן פָּרָה, the word בֶּן is not the particle, but the noun. (Schnurrer was the first to adduce this from among various opinions collected together in the commentary of R. Tanchum.) בֶּן signifies the base, the pedestal (cf. Ex. xxx. 18); and in truth Issachar was this for the whole battle. It was fought on his territory, and his men formed the reserve of Barak, when that chieftain threw himself into the valley. בְּעֶמְקָא שְׁלַח בְּרַקְלִי expresses the storm-like rapidity of Barak's movement. The Pual שְׁלַח is to be taken in the sense of the Greek middle voice. — Presently the thought occurs to the prophets that still other neighboring tribes could have helped, Reuben, namely, and Gilead, beyond the Jordan, Dan at its sources, Asher on the coast; but their assistance did not come. Deborah does not blame the distant tribes, as Judah, Simeon, Ephraim, Benjamin, Gad, but only the near ones. Reuben at that time cannot have dwelt to the east of the Dead Sea, but according to Num. xxxii. 26, etc., must have had a more northerly location, reaching as far up as the banks of the Jabbok.<sup>1</sup> There he must have dwelt, pasturing his herds by his brooks. בְּפְלִגֹּת, plural of פְּלִגָּה, like פְּלִגָּה, brook, stream (cf. my exposition of Ps. i. Luther. Zeitschr., 1859, p. 537). Reuben, like the tribes beyond the Jordan generally, had been called on by Barak to take part in the war against Sisera. In like manner was Sparta summoned by Athens, before Marathon. And like Sparta, Reuben considered long. Hence the derisive description of the men of Reuben as חִקְרֵי.

לֵב, חִקְרֵי לֵב and לֵב, investigators and scrutinizers. They reflect upon the necessity and feasibility of acting, till the time for it is past. Reuben sits between the folds, and prefers to listen to the shepherd's flute, שְׁרִיקוֹת, שְׁרִיקוֹת, pipe, flute, from שָׁרַק, sibilare, to whistle, to hiss, according to the root and form of the name, is nothing else than the syrix, pipe, whose invention Hellenic mythology ascribed to Pan. What is here said of Reuben, that he amuses himself with listening to the herdsmen's flutes (שְׁרִיקוֹת is properly the herd), is the same that Homer says, Iliad, xviii. 525: "βοῦνδες ἀκούοντο σφύριγι."

Ver. 17. And Gilead tarries beyond Jordan. The fact that what is here said of Gilead might be equally applied to Reuben, since both dwelt beyond the Jordan, is suggestive of the excuse which Gilead may have urged in distinction from Reuben. Reuben reflected; but Gilead denied that the efforts of Barak concerned him: did he not live beyond the Jordan?

But Dan, how didst thou sail in ships!<sup>2</sup> Jewish tradition places the occurrence related in ch. xviii. before the time of Deborah. And to all appearance this seems to be the right view. For in its southern possessions the tribe of Dan did not hold the sea-coast (Judg. i. 34). Moreover, how should Deborah complain of the want of assistance from southern Dan, when she entered no such complaint against Judah? If, however, Dan had already removed to the vicinity of Naphtali, the complaint was very natural. The old expositors explain that "Dan had shipped his goods and chattels in order to cross the Jordan." But this is less simple than the supposition that Dan, like Zebulun, was engaged with the Phenicians (Tyre) in maritime commerce, or at least pretended to be, as a reason for refusing Barak's summons. What renders this interpretation the more probable, is the fact that Deborah speaks next of Asher, "who dwells on the sea-shore." Jabin, king of Hazor, cannot have domineered over the coast, where the powerful maritime cities were in the ascendancy. Therefore Asher also had nothing to suffer from him. He dwells securely in his harbors. It is noteworthy that what the singer here says of Asher, the blessing of Jacob says in the same words of Zebulun, לְחוֹף יָמִים וְשָׁבוֹן, with an additional clause, however, concerning the pursuit of navigation.

Ver. 18. This verse puts it beyond all doubt that only Zebulun and Naphtali engaged actively in the conflict; for only to them refers the declaration that they "hazarded their souls unto death." (For the sake of the poetical parallelism Naphtali is put at the head of the second member, instead of making "Zebulun and Naphtali" the composite subject of the whole distich.) Their faith in Deborah's word was so firm, that they dared risk the unequal conflict even in the valley ("the high-plain of the field"). Therein consisted the uncommon sacrifice of these tribes. Hitherto, Israel had always given up the valleys (cf. Judg. i. 19, 34), because it could not overcome disciplined armies and chariots. Even down to the time of the later kings, it was considered invincible on the mountains (1 Kgs. xx. 23), which fact however implies that in the valleys it still continued to be otherwise. Hence, קְרוֹמֵי שָׂדֵה is to be understood, not of the "heights," but of the surface, of the field.<sup>3</sup> It was a fearful battle-crisis: a few against so many, a band of footmen against a host of iron chariots, a handful of mountaineers on the plain, a few tribal chieftains against the mighty.

Ver. 19. Kings came. This is to be understood figuratively, of eminent and powerful military leaders: Sisera was no king.<sup>4</sup> בָּצַע בְּקָחָהּ לָהּ

לְקָרָהּ, gain of money they obtained not. This is usually understood only of the booty, which the enemy hoped to obtain, but failed to get. But the troops of Zebulun and Naphtali can scarcely have appeared to promise a booty rich in money. It is therefore probable that the meaning of the proph- above the general level, not surface. In connection with the facts of the history, the expression, it seems to me, can only mean either Mount Tabor or the higher parts of the plain of Esdraelon, as the gathering-place of the warriors, where they in thought and intention "scorned their lives." So Bachmann and many other expositors. — Ta.]

etcs includes something else. We know from instances of later times, that when the people did not feel themselves strong enough to cope with a threatening enemy, they sought to buy him off with money. Thus, in the reign of Rehoboam, Shishak, king of Egypt, took away all the treasures of the temple (1 Kgs. xiv. 26). Aša gave all the remaining gold and silver to Benhadad of Damascus (1 Kgs. xv. 18). Menahem collected a large amount of money in order to persuade the king of Assyria to turn back (2 Kgs. xv. 20). Sisera was not so successful. He neither obtained composition-money before the campaign, nor did he secure any booty after it. The troops and their leaders who had accompanied him, gained no profit from this expedition. Profit is the prominent idea in מַמְנוֹן; hence the Chaldee Paraphrast usually puts "Mammon" for it.

Vers. 20-22. From heaven fought the stars. Josephus has introduced into his narrative of this victory, the description of a thunder-storm, accompanied by wind and hail, by which the enemy were thrown into confusion. It is one of those pragmatical endeavors by which he seeks to facilitate belief for his Hellenic readers, and to make the miraculous more natural. The occasion for it was given by the expression, ch. iv. 15, "and God confounded them." The presence and effect of thunder and hail were inferred, by comparison, from two other passages, where a similar divinely-wrought confusion of the enemy is related. Thus in Josh. x. 10, 11, when Joshua fights against the enemy, it is said: "And the Lord confounded them, and as they fled cast down great hailstones upon them, that they died." So also 1 Sam. vii. 10: "And the Lord thundered with a great thunder on that day, and confounded the Philistines." But there appears to be no necessity whatever for transferring these occurrences into our passage. The narrator is rather thinking of Ex. xiv. 24, which speaks of Pharaoh's confusion by God without thunder and hail. Nor is there any need of thunder and hail to confound an army. The confusion of Rosbach (Nov. 5, 1757) was not caused by the intervention of a storm. All that appears from the statements of ch. iv. and the Song of Deborah alone, is, that Barak and his faithful followers made a violent and sudden attack, before the numerous chariots had been placed in battle-array. This was done as night was coming on. When Joshua fought, sun and moon assisted him (Josh. x. 12): on Barak, the stars shone brightly, — which does not make a thunder-storm probable. Consistently with Israelitish conceptions, the help of the stars can only be understood of their shining.<sup>1</sup> Joshua also had come upon his enemies suddenly (מִתְנִיחַ, Josh. x. 9). Gideon, too, threw himself upon the hostile camp in the night. But not the stars alone assisted Barak in his heroic course. As the enemy, either for attack or in flight, wished to cross the Kishon, in the direction from Taanach and Megiddo, the swollen stream swept many of them into the arms of death.

"The brook Kishon snatched (שָׁחַטָה) them away."

(קִישׁוֹן, in its Semitic forms, corresponds to the Indo-Germanic forms rapere, Ger. raffen, Sanskrit, rup.) It thus came to the help of Israel, and became a מַמְנוֹן קִישׁוֹן, brook of succors. In what sense the Kishon should be especially called a brook of "ancient days," as many explain מַמְנוֹן קִישׁוֹן, cannot be made out, not at least from Scripture.<sup>2</sup> The rendering "brook of battles," has little ground in philology. The repetition of "brook Kishon," is doubtless intended to suggest a definition of what sort of a stream the Kishon was for Israel on that day. It was not merely the scene of battle, but an instrument of help against the foe. קִישׁוֹן has frequently this sense, especially in poetical language. In Ps. lxxix. 8 the poet prays, "Let thy mercy come speedily to our help" (קִישׁוֹן מִיָּד); cf. Ps. lix. 11; xxi. 4. But in Deuteronomy, also, ch. xxiii. 5, it is said of Ammon and Moab that they did not help Israel with bread and water (קִישׁוֹן מִיָּד קִישׁוֹן מִיָּד). Kedumim is the plural of a form קִישׁוֹן. The Kishon — thus exalts the poet — showed itself a helpful stream. The statement that it snatched the enemies away, presupposes its swollen condition. It is only after the rainy season that the Kishon runs full; for which reason the LXX. call it χειμαρῶν, winter-flowing. In summer it is for the most part dried up; but in the spring it sends down a rushing flood. Ritter (xvi. 704, Gage's Transl. iv. 351) adduces the fact that on the 16th of April, 1799, in a conflict between the French and Turks, many of the latter perished in its raging waters. Hence we may infer that the time of Barak's battle is to be fixed in the latter part of April or the beginning of May. The Feast of Weeks fell in the same season.<sup>3</sup> Immediately after the narrative in Exodus, it is intimated that the manifestation on Sinai occurred in the beginning of the third month, and consequently coincided with the Feast of Weeks. The occurrence of the battle in a season devoted to such commemorations, explains with peculiar emphasis the opening lines of the Song, concerning the omnipotence of God on Sinai, "when the earth trembled." The ancients had a not ungrounded tradition, — to prove which this is not the place, — for regarding the lxviiith Psalm as a song for the Feast of Weeks; and it is just that psalm which incorporated into itself the introductory parts of Deborah's Song.

<sup>1</sup> [Berthieu takes the words "the stars fought," as figurative language, expressive of divine assistance. "From the decisive victory it is certain that God was with Israel and fought in the midst of them, ver. 13 [read according to the Masoretic text division]; that He himself threw the hostile host into confusion, ch. iv. 16; and that the strong arm of a higher Power directed the course of the battle. All this is clearly and vividly present to the mind of the Singer. Filled with the thoughts of God's wonderful aid, and venturing under the impulses of a bold enthusiasm to give definite representation of his distinctly recognized yet mysterious work on earth and in the midst of men, it is to her as if the heavens, the eternal dwelling-place of the holy God, had bowed themselves down to earth, or — to use the language of the text — as if the stars, forsaking their usual orbits, had fought against Sisera. Quite similar is the imagery in Ps. xviii." The same view is adopted by Bachmann and many others. — Tr.]

<sup>3</sup> A Jewish hymn of the Middle Ages, by R. Mair, still sung in the synagogues, at the Passover (Lei Shemurim), transports the battle into the Passover night; for which, however, it has no chronological grounds, but only the theological principle that all achievements of freedom were accomplished in that night.

While singing, the prophetess sees herself transported into the tumult of the battle. The stream rushes violently onward, — the perishing foes contend with its whirling eddies. The roar of the conflict, its battle-cries, and shouts of victory, are around her. In the midst of her Song, she addresses her own soul, as the Greeks addressed their muse, with words of animation and refreshment: Tread vigorously on, my soul! Her genius hovers over the valley of conflict; her ear feels the hoof-strokes of the flying foes, who, panic stricken before Israel, furiously dash off into flight. What a triumph! the "strong ones" (אַנְיָוִים) run away!

רָחַץ is to run fast, used of a horse's trot, like the Sanskrit drav, Greek δραμεν (διδραμεν). אַנְיָוִים, as Bochart already remarked (Hieroz. i. 99), is probably used here, as in Jer. viii. 16; xlvii. 3, of the war-horses, who with their rattling chariots ran wildly off. In that case, the might of the steeds stands representatively for that of the warriors themselves.

Ver. 23. The flying enemy had not succeeded even in escaping, if all places of the surrounding country had done their duty. The prophetess utters sentence of condemnation against the inhabitants of Meroz, because they rendered no assistance. Their aid had probably been important in the pursuit. Hence, their conduct is referred to here, — before the blessing upon Jael. The verse first introduces a messenger of God, crying, "Curse ye Meroz, curse it!" and then continues itself, "Cursed are its inhabitants." The "messenger of God" is the singer herself, sent by the Spirit of God to consummate the victorious achievement. In obedience to the Spirit's prompting, she with Barak pronounces the national ban against the faithless city. For it came not to the help of God (לְעֹזֶרֶת יְהוָה), that is, to the help of the עַם יְהוָה, the People of God, as in vers. 11 and 13. It left the cause and the good gifts of God to their fate, when they were endangered in battle against heroes.<sup>1</sup> The greater the responsibility, the severer the punishment. The higher the cause to be served, the blacker the treason that abandons it. To ascertain, at this date, the site of Meroz, can hardly be possible. It has indeed been supposed to be identical with a place on Robinson's map, southwest of Endor,<sup>2</sup> called Kefr Musr (cf. Ritter, xv. 399 [Gage's Transl. ii. 316]); but neither the name of the place is certain, nor its situation entirely suitable; and, finally, considering the popular odium which the Song of Deborah affixed to the name, it is by no means probable that it remained unchanged, and actually perpetuated itself. Procopius confirms this surmise, when he observes (Reland, Palästina, p. 896), that concerning the name he had found nothing anywhere, not even in Hebrew expositions. The curse itself most probably implied, as in Josh. vi., the utter destruction of the place, although nothing further is said of it. In later times, this verse became a locus classicus for the Talmudic exposition of the ban against persons and things (Mond Katan, 16, a; Shabmoth, 36, a; Selden, de Synedriss, p. 84, etc.).

THE FATE OF THE ENEMY.

Vers. 24-31.

- 24 Blessed among women be Jael,
The wife of Heber, the Kenite,
Blessed among women of the tents!
- 25 He asks for water, she gives him milk,
In a beautiful bowl she carries him cream.
- 26 With her left she takes the nail,<sup>1</sup>
With her right the heavy hammer,
Swings it over Sisera, smites his head,
Crashes through, and transpierces his temples.<sup>2</sup>
- 27 At her feet he curls himself and falls,
At her feet he lies, curls himself again, and falls,
And as he curls himself again, falls — dead!<sup>3</sup>
- 28 Through the window she looks, at the lattice laments the mother of Sisera:
Why lingers his car so long,
Why stay the steps of his chariots?

- 29 Wise ladies answer her,<sup>4</sup>
Herself also refutes her own words:
30 Will they not find booty and divide it?
Two maidens for each man;
Booty of purple robes for Sisera,
Yea, booty of purple robes!
Color-embroidered vestments, two for each neck of the captured!<sup>5</sup>
31 So may all thy foes fall, O God,
But those who love thee rise as the sun in his strength!
And the land rested forty years.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 26. — The rendering of יָדָהּ by "her left hand," — if admissible at all, — must be justified by the assumption of an intended contrast with יְמִינָהּ in the next line. The form תִּשְׁלַחְהָּ, according to Geseuius, Gram. 47, 2, 2, is an improper use of the 3d plural for the 3d singular; according to Green, 88, p. 119, it stands for תִּשְׁלַחְהָּ — "her hand, she puts it forth;" according to Ewald, 191 c, it is simply the 3d fem. sg. תִּשְׁלַחְהָּ, with an additional feminine characteristic (וָהּ) in order to distinguish it from the 3d masc. singular. Ewald's view is also adopted by Bertheau, Kell, and (in the main, by) Bachmann, and is probably the true one. — Tr.]

[2 Ver. 26. — Dr. Cassel's rendering of the last two lines of this verse is as follows: —

Schmettert nach und durchbohrt ihm die Schäfte.*

We have endeavored to reproduce his alliteration as nearly as possible, but have nevertheless lost the paranomasia of חֲלָמָהּ with חֲמַת, hammer, in the preceding line, for which our author has Schlägel, mallet, beetle. The awful energy of the lines, and their onomatopoeic character, may be distantly and somewhat inelegantly imitated in English, thus —

"She hammers Sisera, mashes his head, Smashes (him), and crashes through his temples." — Tr.]

[3 Ver. 27. — The above translation of this verse disregards the Masoretic text-division (according to which נָפַל, "he lies," belongs to the first line), and takes נָפַל in a temporal instead of local sense. The radical meaning of נָפַל is probably "to bend or contract one's self" (cf. Ges. Lex., Kell, Bachmann), the usual sense "to kneel" being derivative. The mortally wounded Sisera, pinned to the ground (ch. iv. 21), involuntarily curls himself together, as Dr. Cassel says — i. e. brings his knees forward and upward. But Dr. Cassel's idea that this involuntary muscular contraction was repeated three times is inconsistent with the proper local sense of נָפַל, and with the repeated נָפַל. Dr. Cassel, it is true, seeks to avoid the latter difficulty by supposing (see the com. below) that Sisera "seeks to rise, and falls back;" but how could he rise so as to fall back when his head was pinned to the ground? It is altogether more likely that in this song of victory, נָפַל is used as in military language (and perhaps not without a touch of contemptuous irony), for "to die," "to be slain," in this sense, נָפַל, like winter, cadere, and our "fall," is frequently used, cf. the Lexica. The repetition of the idea of the first line in the second and third springs from the great interest of the singer in the destruction of the much-dreaded chieftain, and serves to intensify the impression to be produced on those who hear her. Accordingly, we would render: —

At her feet he curls himself, he falls, he lies.
At her feet he curls himself, he falls!
Where he curls himself, there he falls — destroyed.

So also Bertheau, Kell, Bachmann. For אֵת, in the sense of "at" cf. remarks of Hengstenberg on Zech. xiii. 6, in Christol. iv. 106, Edinb. edition. — Tr.]

[4 Ver. 29. — The above translation neglects both the suffix in אִשְׁתֵּי הָיָהּ, and the construct state of חֲמַת (rem. of חֲמַת). In אִשְׁתֵּי הָיָהּ Dr. Cassel apparently finds the 3d fem. sing. imperf. with the suffix of the 3d fem. sing. But as the subject is plural, it is better to take אִשְׁתֵּי הָיָהּ as standing for אִשְׁתֵּי הָיָהּ. The accented e in the latter form seeks to strengthen itself by doubling the following consonant, in which case the y naturally falls away, although it may also remain, as in Mic. vii. 10. Cf. Ewald, Gram. 17 c. The true rendering of the second line of this verse is much disputed. According to Kell the sense of the line is: "Sisera's mother, however, does not allow herself to be quieted by the speeches of her wise ladies, but repeats the anxious question, Why does Sisera delay to come?" He and Bachmann translate the verse thus: —

"The wise ones of her princesses answer:
— But she repeats to herself her words —". — Tr.]

[5 Ver. 30. — On our author's text-division in this verse, see the Commentary below. Bachmann, who adheres to the Masoretic punctuation, translates as follows: —

"Will they not find, divide booty?"

A maiden, two maidens for the head of a man,
 Booty of colored garments for Sisera,
 Booty of colored garments, (of) variegated work,
 A colored garment, two variegated for the neck of the booty." — Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

The closing part of Deborah's Song has justly been regarded as a specimen of poetical representation that cannot be surpassed. In it the singer shows that she is a woman. The triumph with which Jael's deed is praised and Sisera's mother mocked, evinces an almost passionate mental exaltation. The picture of Sisera's death is drawn with startling vividness. On the back ground of a divine enthusiasm, there rises an ecstatic delight in the deed of one woman, and in the misery of another, such as springs up in none but a woman's heart. That which in heathen female characters becomes demoniac in its nature, is in Deborah purified by the divine thoughts which animate her. No subjective interest, no private feeling, no personal passion, influences her; the highest interests of her God and people fill her soul. It is not her triumph, but that of her ever-living Maker, that she celebrates; and yet at the height of its exultation her Song breaks out in a mood by which the woman might be recognized, even if neither name nor other information on the authorship had been handed down to us. That which especially gives to the conclusion of the Song its great value and attractiveness, is the fact that from it the genuineness of the whole becomes even more psychologically than grammatically evident — that the mantic power of a prophetic woman, unweakened and in the full glow of its burning ecstasy, is nowhere else filled and controlled as it is here, by rational enthusiasm born of an objective, divinely-given truth. How well it was said of her, that she was a "woman of a fiery spirit" (ch. iv. 4), becomes here most manifest. The more terrible the tyranny, the more commonplace the enemy, the more intensely burns her soul in her song of victory. The glowing heat of her prophetic enthusiasm shines through the irony, with which she places the vain pride of unbelieving enemies over against the almighty power of God. It is not an irony of hatred, disfiguring the face with scornful smiles, but such as springs from the consciousness that God's wisdom and power are superior to all heroes and heathen. Verse 23, pronouncing the ban against Meroz, says, "thus proclaims the messenger of God." The name of God is the source of all power and authority. Apostasy from God incurs the ban; whoever helps to advance his works, is blessed.

Vers. 24, 25. Blessed among women be Jael. Meroz did not come to the help of the people of God. Jael came, though a woman; and not of Israel, but a dweller in tents. The name of her husband is mentioned to distinguish her from others of the same name, and also to give him an interest in the fame of his wife. Accordingly, for her sake, he also has obtained a place in the records of history. The blessing which she enjoys before all women "in the tent," i. e. before all who like herself and the Kenites wandered about in tents, after the manner of nomads, she did not win by accident. She made an energetic use of her opportunity. She deceives the flying Sisera by the signs of homage which she presents to him. He asks only for water; she offers him milk, and, as was befitting with such a guest, תַּכְּתִּיל אֶדְדִּירִים, in a bowl such as princes use. She takes the handsome show-bowl, not used on ordinary occasions, and hands him תַּכְּתִּיל. This word, which also signifies butter, expresses in general the more solid forms of milk. Here, where it stands parallel with חֶלֶב, it signifies, in harmony with the "show-bowl," the best milk, the cream. There is absolutely nothing to suggest the opinion of older expositors (Schnurrer, p. 83, received by Herder also) that she wished to intoxicate him with the milk. Moreover, we need not assume that the milk was camel-milk; and, at all events, the intoxicating property of that milk<sup>1</sup> must have been known to Sisera. Before Bochart (cf. Serarius, p. 145), Junius and Tremellius had already expressed the opinion, approved by Scaliger, that in תַּכְּתִּיל the Latin simpulum reappears. But saph, saphel, are Hebrew forms of a widely-diffused term for round, scooped-out vessels, whether of larger or smaller size, and may be recognized in the Greek σάφον, bowl, trough, tub, Latin scaphium, and in the German Schaff (tub, pail), Scheffel (modius), a round measure.<sup>2</sup> It is true, however, that saphel continued to be used among the Jews (in the Talmud) and Syrians, and that the shape of the vessel may be most nearly expressed by simpulum, which, as Cicero's proverb, "fluctus in simpulo" — a tempest in a nutshell — proves, was a smaller drinking-vessel.

Vers. 26, 27. The first of these verses shows that the narrator in ch. iv. was in possession of traditional information beside that furnished by this Song. The prophethood passes over intermediate, self-evident matters. Sisera, of course, must lie down and sleep, before a woman can approach his head with hammer and nail. The verse depicts the dreadful work and vigor of Jael, as she approaches and drives the nail into Sisera's head.

The terms employed (חֶלֶב, מֶרֶס, הָלֵם) are such as cause us to hear the blows of the hammer, sounding repeatedly, till she finishes her work. What a terrible picture! Before the warrior stands the kindled woman — the heavy hammer (as Herder finely translated הַלְמַת עֲמָלִים, for עֲמֵל is one who works hard or heavily, a toiler) in her right hand. The smitten chieftain draws himself together, he seeks to rise, and falls back. Twice more he writhes convulsively, and dies. There he lies, the haughty warrior, who thought to destroy the People of God — slain by a woman in disgraceful flight, far from his kindred, alone and unhelped, an example to conquerors of human weakness and divine power. (שָׁדֵד is the condition of utter lifelessness, when every sound and motion has ceased; hence it stands in contrast with קָרַע, which describes the wounded man instinctively bending and drawing himself together, as if about to rise.)

Vers. 28-31. But the fall of Sisera in the tent of a woman does not complete the picture of the extraordinary triumph. The prophetic shows yet another view. She carries her hearers to a distant scene. While Sisera lies here in ignominious death, what takes place in the palace of his capital? The return of the chieftain, accustomed to victory, has already been long expected. His mother stands at the window above,<sup>1</sup> in the airy upper room. Her view commands the road to a great distance. She peers and listens; but still the rolling of the victorious chariots is not heard. No triumphal procession, with Sisera at its head, gorgeously attired and proud of victory, lights up the horizon. A sad presentiment steals over her heart: Why does his chariot delay? she cries, wailingly;<sup>2</sup> why does he tarry so long? Is there no car<sup>3</sup> coming, to bring tidings at least?—Who should first suffer anxiety, if not a mother? Of a wife, nothing is said; such love thrives not in the harem of a prince. He is his mother's pride, the great hero, who had hitherto been invincible. What she has in him, and what she loses, concerns no other woman. With this pride, her women, noble ladies, whom her high rank as mother of the all-powerful commander draws around her, comfort her. Victory, they say, has also its occupations. If he has not come yet, it is because these detain him. No other explanation of his non-arrival is possible. Anxiety, therefore, is improper. For it is precisely victory that delays him. This is what her women say to her; the flattered mother admits the justness of their observations, and with them confutes her own foreboding questions.<sup>4</sup> The prophetic, with delicate irony, calls the women who thus counsel, "wise ones." It is the wisdom of a pride that deems it inconceivable that Sisera should not have been victorious; how could he prove unfortunate against this insignificant people! What to them is the God of Israel! It is the booty that hinders his coming. Booty, of course, delays the victor; for he must cause it to be divided. The mother and her women naturally think first of the booty; to them, that is the pith of all victories. Their fancy then proceeds to picture at pleasure the conquered treasures. How much time must it take, before every soldier has the two maidens whom he obtains as booty, assigned to him!<sup>5</sup> And then the heap of costly clothing. The purple garments fall naturally to Sisera, for they are suitable only for princes. But each of the others also obtains embroidered garments, always two, for each maiden that fell to his share. In this strain they talk with each other, and already imagine themselves to be looking over the goods which Sisera is bringing with him. But all at once the message comes: No booty, no victory—the hero is dead, the army is shattered! All is lost—the castle falls . . . .

<sup>2</sup> וְהַיָּבֵב יָבֵב occurs only in this passage. It is an onomatopoeic word, like the German "jammern," [cf. the English "wailing."] In Chaldee, however, it chiefly has the sense of "crying," "sounding," in a favorable as well as unfavorable sense.

<sup>3</sup> "Why delay מִדְּבַרְיָי?" פָּעַם may be used of any kind of repeated motion, like that of treading; and therefore also of the rolling of wheels.

So perish they who set themselves against God. Fearful sorrow breaks their pride. But they who love God conquer. Their type is the sun, who like a flame-crowned victor, every morning, every spring, triumphs gloriously, with hero-like power, over clouds and darkness.

Account must here be given for departures from the ordinary division and translation in ver. 30. That verse, like several others in Deborah's Song, has undergone an incredible amount of conjecture and emendation. It reads as follows:—

1. יָהִל יִסְרָאֵל בְּחֵלְהָ שָׁלָל

2. יָהִל יִסְרָאֵל בְּחֵלְהָ שָׁלָל

3. שָׁלָל צָבָעִים לְיִסְרָאֵל

4. שָׁלָל צָבָעִים

5. יָהִל יִסְרָאֵל בְּחֵלְהָ שָׁלָל

Victors found their greatest satisfaction and joy in the booty. Hence, Moses also makes Pharaoh say (Ex. xv. 9): "I will pursue, I will divide the spoil." The women took for granted that Sisera will find (יִסְרָאֵל) much booty, and that consequently a division will commence. Lines 2-5 point out the method of the division. First (line 3) each man gets two maidens, or women. Then the garments are divided. But how this was done, depends upon the explanation of line 5, particularly of the words שָׁלָל צָבָעִים. The difficulty<sup>6</sup> under which expositors labored, originated in their failing to perceive that שָׁלָל means the booty of maidens mentioned in line 2. It cannot be denied that שָׁלָל is booty of persons as well as of things, cf. Num. xxxi. 11. Zech. ii. 13 (9) says, "They become a spoil to those who have served them." In Isa. x. 2, widows are called שָׁלָל, cf. Jer. xxi. 9, as also Jer. l. 10, where the Chaldeans are spoken of as booty. An entirely analogous error used to be made in interpreting the celebrated chorus in the Antigone of Sophocles:—

"Ἐπεὶ δὲ λείπει μάχην,
"Ἐπεὶ, ὅς ἐν κτήμασι τίττεις"

the word κτῆμασι being understood, not of "the unfree," but always of things (cf. Weimar. Jahrbuch für Deutsche Lit., ii. 359). The "unfree" booty consists of men, animals, and things. So here, שָׁלָל צָבָעִים are the necks of the women taken as booty. For each neck two cloths are allowed.

Thus the יָהִל יִסְרָאֵל בְּחֵלְהָ שָׁלָל of line 5 corresponds to the יָהִל יִסְרָאֵל בְּחֵלְהָ שָׁלָל of line 2. The division was thus systematized. As many women as each had,

<sup>4</sup> נִשְׁקָפָה. The mother replies herself to her own words, corrects herself. She does not answer the others,—an interpretation neither philologically congruous, nor in harmony with the fact that they have not said anything which the mother would wish to refute. Cf. Job, xxxv. 4, and Prov. xxii. 31.

so many times did he receive two cloths (for doubtless the dual form here really signifies the dual number). Now, it must not be overlooked that  $\text{לְבָשֵׁי}$  is used only in connection with the division of the cloths according to the number of maidens.

Elsewhere also (Ezek. xxvi. 16, excepted)  $\text{לְבָשֵׁי}$  appears as an article of female adornment, cf. Ps. xiv. 15, for instance; also in Ezek. xvi. 13, the figure is that of a woman. This confirms the above division, and explains the expression of line 3:  $\text{לְבָשֵׁי צִיּוֹן לְבָשֵׁי צִיּוֹן}$ . The  $\text{צִיּוֹן}$  which the chieftain is to receive, are distinguished from the  $\text{לְבָשֵׁי צִיּוֹן}$ , which fall to the maidens. The latter are beautifully-colored female dress-cloths; <sup>1</sup> the former belong to Sisera, and are therefore to be taken as purple garments. It is true,  $\text{צָרַף}$ , in itself, means only to dip, i. e. to dye; but the spirit of the passage invites us to think not of merely colored, but of purple-colored garments, purp. d'royale. Such garments were worn by princes in battle (cf. Judg. viii. 26), and distinguished kings and rulers; by reason of which it was an honor for Mordecai to wear them (Esth. viii. 15; cf. Rosenmüller, Morgenland, iii. 37). It is a proud thought for Sisera's mother, that the princely garments belong to her son. The repetition of the words  $\text{לְבָשֵׁי צִיּוֹן}$  (line 4) is to be taken as expressive of this joy. The women do not speak, as has perhaps been supposed, of what they themselves shall receive, but simply represent to themselves how much time must be consumed in dividing so much booty among so many persons, in order to explain that which so greatly needed explanation — the delay of Sisera.

We omit recounting the various different explanations of this section. Nor is room allowed us to notice the manifold endeavors that have been made to analyze the arrangement of the whole Song. Neither Köster's, nor Ewald's, nor Bertheau's division holds good. Le Clerc attempted to arrange the Song according to endings of similar sound, — an attempt that must necessarily fail. On the other hand, alliteration is of such frequent occurrence, as to betray more than anything else the presence of conscious art. Since the Song, however, is not built up of regular strophes, it of course cannot be subject to the same regular laws which govern the Scandinavian poems. But the alliterative form, in its perfect freedom, enhances the power of the Song to an extraordinary degree. It resembles in its effects the pebble-stones of the brook, over which the current flows with augmented force. It would transcend the limits of our present task to institute a comparison between the various productions of the Hebrew muse with reference to this alliterative form. Let it suffice, that in the rendering of the original we have endeavored to give prominence to the delicacy of the alliteration as it appears in this Song of Deborah.

And the land rested forty years. These words do not belong to the Song; but connect themselves with the prose narrative, at ch. iv. 24, into which the poem was inserted.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Deborah, the prophetic Singer. After the victory, Deborah sings a noble song, and thereby enables us to recognize that the spirit which animates her is the spirit of prophecy. The other Judges conquer like herself, but they have left us no songs of victory. But, indeed, they are not said to have been prophets. Only prophetic tongues can sing. True poetry is a sacred art. For that reason, all prophecy is a sublime hymn on judgment and divine redemption. Whatever the prophet sees, he proclaims and sings to the harp of faith. What they believed, that they spoke. The wonderful works of God are always spoken of and preached with other tongues and in ecstatic song. Thus, from David's time till now, the church of God has sung. Hallelujah is the keynote of all church-hymns.

But, just as Deborah, like Moses and Miriam, sang among the people, so the prophecy of song is not confined within the limits of the church. All popular poetry is the product of popular faith. The decay of literature is bound up in the decay of prophetic inspiration. Rhymes and verbal decorations do not rouse the masses. But when the jubilant heart, redeemed, strikes up its Easter-song, then every pulse will beat responses.

STARKE: Although God has not committed the regular office of preaching to women, he has nevertheless many times imparted his prophetic Spirit to them, and through them has spoken great things. — THE SAME: All who share in the benefits of God, should also join in bringing Him praise and thanksgiving. — GERLACH: An age in which this sublime, high-wrought, and spirited song could be composed, though full of restless and wildly antagonistic movements, was certainly not without deep and living consciousness of the high and glorious calling of the covenant-people.

[WORDSWORTH: We have a song of victory in Exodus; we have a song of victory in Numbers; we have a song of victory in Deuteronomy; we have this song of victory in Judges; we have a song of victory in the first of Samuel; we have a song of victory in the second of Samuel; we have the song of Zacharias, and the Magnificat, or Song of the Blessed Virgin, and the song of Simeon, in the Gospel; and all these songs are preludes to the new song, the song of Moses and of the Lamb, which the Saints of the Church glorified, from all nations, will sing, at the crystal sea, with the harps of God, when all the enemies of Christ and his Church will have been subdued, and their victory will be consummated forever (Rev. xiv. 1-3; xv. 2-4). — THE SAME (on ver. 17): Here, in Dan and Asher, is the second hindrance to zeal for God's cause; the other was that in the case of Reuben — comparative distance from the scene of danger, and rural occupation (see vers. 15, 16). They who live in commercial and maritime cities, engaged in worldly business, are tempted to prefer their own worldly interest to the cause of God and his Church. They who thus act, imitate Dan, and forfeit the blessing of Deborah. They also who live in country villages, removed from the din of controversy, and engaged in farming and other

occurs, Ps. xxxix. 15, it signifies "to weave." Robinson (Bib. Repos., i. 610) says: "The verb  $\text{צָרַף}$ , both in Hebrew and Arabic, signifies to diversify, make variegated, so, in color; and is not necessarily applied to needlework." Cf. also Bachmann, in loc. — Ta.]

rural occupations, have strong temptations to live merely to themselves, and to stand aloof from their brethren, and not to listen to Deborah's voice, and not to flock to Barak's standard, and fight God's battle together with them against the heresy and infidelity which assail his Church. — THE SAME (on ver. 18): Zebulun and Naphtali, in "Galilee of the Gentiles," sent forth champions to the Lord's battle against the enemies of the Hebrew Church; and their land was afterwards honored as the scene of Christ's preaching (see Matt. iv. 13), and gave birth to many of the Apostles, the first champions of the Christian Church against the spiritual Siseras of this world. — THE SAME (on ver. 31): After the stirring emotions of the tempest of the elements, and the rush of the combatants, and the din of arms, and shock of battle, described with wonderful energy in this divine poem, the land had rest; a beautiful contrast, and an emblem of the peaceful calm which will prevail when the storms of this world will be lulled in the Sabbath of Eternity. — HENRY: And well had it been if, when the churches and the tribes had rest, they had been edified, and had walked in the fear of the Lord. — TR.]

FOURTH SECTION.

THE INCURSIONS AND OPPRESSIONS OF THE MIDIANITES. GIDEON, THE JUDGE WHO REFUSES TO BE KING.

The Midianites invade the land seven years. Israel cries to Jehovah, and is answered through a prophet, who reminds them of their sins.

CHAPTER VI. 1-10.

- 1 And the children [sons] of Israel did evil in the sight of the Lord [Jehovah]:
- 2 and the Lord [Jehovah] delivered them into the hand of Midian seven years. And the hand of Midian prevailed [was strong] against [over] Israel: and because of the Midianites the children [sons] of Israel made them the dens [grottoes] which
- 3 are in the mountains, and [the] caves, and [the] strong holds. And so it was, when Israel had sown [his fields], that the Midianites came up, and the Amalekites, and the children [sons] of the east, even they came up against them [and passed
- 4 over them]:<sup>1</sup> And they encamped against [upon] them, and destroyed [ruined] the increase [produce, cf. Deut. xxxii. 22] of the earth, till thou come unto Gaza;
- 5 and left no sustenance<sup>2</sup> for [in] Israel, neither sheep, nor ox, nor ass. For they came up with their cattle and their tents, and they came as grasshoppers [locusts] for multitude; for both they and their camels were without number: and they
- 6 entered into the land to destroy [ruin] it. And Israel was greatly impoverished [reduced] because of the Midianites; and the children [sons] of Israel cried unto
- 7 the Lord [Jehovah]. And it came to pass, when the children [sons] of Israel
- 8 cried unto the Lord [Jehovah] because of the Midianites, That the Lord [Jehovah] sent a prophet unto the children [sons] of Israel, which [and he] said unto them, Thus saith the Lord [Jehovah, the] God of Israel, I brought you up from Egypt [cf. 1 Sam. x. 18] and brought you forth out of the house of bondage [Ex. xiii. 3];
- 9 And I delivered you out of the hand of the Egyptians, and out of the hand of all that oppressed you, and drave them out from before you, and gave you their land;
- 10 And I said unto you, I am the Lord [Jehovah] your God; fear not [ye shall not fear, i. e. reverence] the gods of the Amorites, in whose land ye dwell: but ye have not obeyed my voice.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

1 Ver. 8. — וַיָּקֶם עָלָיו: literally, "came up upon him," or, "came up against him." Dr. Cassel supplies וַיָּקֶם עָלָיו, and accordingly makes "him" refer to "field." But although this rendering suits the connection admirably well, it cannot be supposed that the Hebrew writer would have left the accusative after עָלָיו unexpressed if he had intended to refer back to it by means of a pronoun, especially when the latter could so readily be referred to another noun. וְעָלָה עִלְיָה simply adds the idea of hostility, which the preceding עָלָה left unexpressed. In like manner, עָלָה, in the next verse, explains that the "encamping" was "against" Israel — had hostile purposes in view. — Tr.]

[Ver. 4. — מִן הַחַיָּה: Dr. Cassel, Lebensmittel, "means of life." So also Kell: "They left no provisions (produce of the field) in Israel, and neither sheep, nor cattle, nor ass." Dr. Cassel, in a foot-note, gives a simple reference to 2 Chron. xiv. 12 (13), where, however, the word unquestionably means anything "alive." Bertheau adopts that meaning here; but cf. ch. xvii. 10. — Tr.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Ver. 1. And Jehovah delivered them into the hand of Midian. Of the death of Deborah and Barak, no mention is made; the peace which their great deeds procured lasted forty years. But those deeds were already forgotten again; and with them the God whose Spirit had begotten them. Then fresh bondage and misery came, and reminded the people of Him who alone can save. Numerous tribes of eastern nomads invaded, plundered, and devastated the land. The transjordanic tribes could at that time offer them no such resistance as, according to 1 Chron. v. 10, 19, they were able, at a later date, to make against the Hagarites, Jetur, Nephish, and Nodab. The present invaders are called Midian, and appear in league with Amalek and the "sons of the east." The Midianites are wandering tribes in the desert of Sinai, in the neighborhood of the Moabites, answering both in name and manner of life to the Bedouins. In the constantly occurring interchange of מ and נ (m and n) in the Semitic dialects, the Arabic tongue seems to prefer the נ, while the Hebrew inclines to the מ (cf. Timnath and Tibneh). The Bedouin derives his name from the Arabic بَدَوِي, the desert; an expression of which the Hebrew בָּדָד, to be desolate and waste, readily reminds one. The derivation from בָּדָד, formerly current, is too artificial, since the prominent idea of the term Bedouin is not a reference to pasture lands, but to the desert. The name Midian manifestly belongs to the same root — מִדְיָן<sup>1</sup> being the same as מִדְיָן, primitive Bedawin, who, like the Towara of the present day (Ritter, xiv. 937), engaged in the carrying trade between the Euphrates and Egypt, and in general pillage. Not all desert tribes boast the same descent, as in fact the Ishmaelites and the Midianites did not belong to the same family; both, however, followed similar modes of life, and hence are sometimes designated by one and the same name (Gen. xxxvii. 25, 28; Judg. viii. 22, 24). They are dwellers in tents, as contrasted with those who till the earth or dwell in cities.

Ver. 2. And the sons of Israel made them the grottoes which are in the mountains, and the caves and the strongholds. The word for grottoes is מְקוֹתֵיהֶם, and an entirely satisfactory description of them is given by Wetzstein (Hauran, p. 45): "At some rocky, elevated, and dry place, a shaft was sunk obliquely into the earth; and at a depth of about twenty-five fathoms, streets were run off, straight, and from six to eight paces wide, in the sides of which the dwellings were excavated. At various points these streets were extended to double their ordinary width, and the roof was pierced with airholes, more or less numerous according to the extent of the place. These airholes are at present called raeen, plural raudsien (windows)." From this may be seen how accurately Raschi and Kimchi explained the above word, when they made it mean "caves with air-holes like windows." The remark of R. Tanchum is likewise correct, that watchmen were employed, who gave alarm signals when the enemy approached. As soon as these were given, the ploughmen and herds hurried quickly into the earth, and were secure. Commonly, says Wetzstein, these excavations had a second place of exit; and consequently, in a region whose inhabitants are liable to constant attacks from the desert (he speaks of the Hauran), are regarded as strongholds. Quite appropriate, apparently, is the rendering of that Greek version which translates מְקוֹתֵיהֶם by μυδρα, an inclosed space, a fold, stable. In later times, eastern monks, who lived in such grottoes, called the cloister itself μυδρα.<sup>2</sup>

Vers. 3; 4. Till thou come unto Gaza.<sup>3</sup> They were expeditions for plunder and devastation, such as the Bedouin tribes of the present day are still accustomed to undertake against hostile communities.<sup>4</sup> Their general direction was towards the plain. The invaders, however, did not content themselves with ruining the growing crops from east to west, but also scoured the land towards the south. Gaza, moreover, formerly as in later times, was the great bazaar of stolen wares, brought to-

<sup>2</sup> [Kell: "The power of the Midianites and their confederates bore so heavily on the Israelites, that these 'made for themselves the clefts which are in the mountains, and the caves, and the strongholds,' those, namely, which were afterwards (at the time when our Book was written) everywhere to be found in the land, and in times of war offered secure places of refuge. This is indicated by the definite article before מְקוֹתֵיהֶם and the other substantives. The words, 'they made for themselves,' are not at variance with the fact that in the limestone mountains of Palestine there exist many natural caves. For, on the one hand, they do not affirm that all the caves found in the land were made at that time by the Israelites, nor on the other does וְעָלָה, to make, exclude the use of natural caves for purposes of safety, since it applies not only to the digging and laying out of new caves, but also to the fitting up of natural ones. . . . For the rest, these clefts, caves, and strongholds, were to serve, not merely as hiding-places for the fugitive Israelites, but much more as places of concealment and security for their property and the necessities of life. For the Midianites, like genuine Bedouins, were more intent on plunder and pillage, and the desolation of the country, than on the destruction of the people." — Tr.]

Ver. 5. As locusts (Sept. ḥap̄is, cf. Il. xxi. 12) for multitude: a comparison suggestive both of their numbers and of the effects of their presence. The Midianite devastation was like that by locusts. In Hauran, says Wetstein, various plagues are found; the locust is bad, but the worst are the Bedouins (p. 43). A Bedouin said to him: "The Ruwalla have become like the hosts of God," i. e., numerous as the locusts, for these are called Gumud Allah (Hauran, p. 138). — Camels without number. In such extravagant hyperbolisms the speech of Orientals has always abounded. When Burkhart asked a Bedouin, who belonged to a tribe of three hundred tents, how many brothers he had, throwing a handful of sand into the air, he replied, "equally numberless." The invaders' object was not to gather the harvest, but only to destroy. What they needed, they had with them — cattle, tents, and camels.

Vers. 6-10. And the sons of Israel cried unto Jehovah. When the people were brought low (עָנָה) they repented. Distress teaches prayer. With Israel repentance went hand in hand with the remembrance of their former strength. They lose themselves when they lose their God; they find themselves when they turn to Him. This the prophet sets before them. The words put into the mouth of the unknown preacher, reproduce the old penitential discourse. In various but similar forms that discourse ever reappears; for it rests on Mosaic warnings and declarations whose truth all the fortunes of Israel confirm. For the first time, however, the verb עָנָה, to fear, elsewhere used only with reference to God, is here connected with heathen gods; but only to point out the fact that disobedient Israel has yielded to idol gods the reverence which it owed to the eternal God. When such rebukes are gladly heard by the people, deliverance is near at hand. When they believe themselves to have deserved such admonitions and punishments, they again believe God. In accepting the judge, we secure the deliverer. Such is the historical experience of all ages.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Israel had again apostatized, notwithstanding

1 [BETHREAU: "Since the expeditions of eastern tribes follow the same plan at every repetition, and since, according to ver. 23, they encamped in the valley of Jezreel, and moreover made their incursion with their herds and camels, it is evident that they must have entered the country by the one great connecting road between the East and Palas-

the victory and the song of Deborah. SAILER: "When one has drunk, he turns his back upon the fountain; but it is only the ingrate who does this." Israel was altogether as it had been formerly, but God's judgment assumes a new form. Greater than ever was the humiliation. Israel was not simply oppressed by a tyranny like that of Sisera, who was in the land, but it was like a slave who toils for a foreign master. Had it accomplished its task? Midian came and seized the fruit. So he who falls away from God who gives, must for that very reason serve sin, which takes. — STARKE: The strongest fortress, defense, and weapon, with which in danger we can protect ourselves, is prayer.

[Bp. HALL: During the former tyranny, Deborah was permitted to judge Israel under a palm-tree; under this, not so much as private habitations will be allowed to Israel. Then, the seat of judgment was in sight of the sun; now, their very dwellings must be secret under the earth. They that rejected the protection of God, are glad to seek to the mountains for shelter; and as they had savagely abused themselves, so they are fain to creep into dens and caves of the rocks, like wild creatures, for safeguard. God had sown spiritual seed amongst them, and they suffered their heathenish neighbors to pull it up by the roots; and now, no sooner can they sow their material seed, but Midianites and Amalekites are ready by force to destroy it. As they inwardly dealt with God, so God deals outwardly by them; their eyes may tell them what their souls have done; yet that God whose mercy is above the worst of our sin, sends first his prophet with a message of reproof, and then his angel with a message of deliverance. The Israelites had smarted enough with their servitude, yet God sends them a sharp rebuke. It is a good sign when God chides us; his round reprehensions are ever gracious forerunners of mercy; whereas, his silent connivance at the wicked argues deep and secret displeasure; the prophet made way for the angel, reproof for deliverance, humiliation for comfort. — HENRY: Sin dispirits men, and makes them sneak into dens and caves. The day will come, when chief captains and mighty men will call in vain to rocks and mountains to hide them. — TR.]

tine, which crosses the depression of the Jordan near Bethshean, and issues into the plain of Jezreel. The extension of their inroads thence, is indicated by the fact that Gass, at the southwestern extremity of the land, is named as the limit of their advance." Cf. Dr. Cassel's remarks on ver. 11, p. 111. — TR.]

CHAPTER VI. 11-24.

11 And there came an angel of the Lord [Jehovah], and sat under an [the] oak which was [is] in Ophrah, that pertained unto Joash the Abi-ezrite: and his son Gideon threshed [was threshing]<sup>1</sup> wheat by [in] the wine-press, to hide it from the 12 Midianites. And the angel of the Lord [Jehovah] appeared unto him, and said unto him, The Lord [Jehovah] is with thee, thou mighty man of valour [valiant 13 hero]. And Gideon said unto him, O [Pray,] my Lord, if the Lord [Jehovah] be with us, why then is all this befallen us? and where be all his miracles which our fathers told us of, saying, Did not the Lord [Jehovah] bring us up from Egypt? but now the Lord [Jehovah] hath forsaken us, and delivered us into the hands of 14 the Midianites. And the Lord [Jehovah] looked upon [turned towards] him, and said, Go in this thy might, and thou shalt save [and save thou] Israel from the 15 hand of the Midianites: have not I sent thee? And he said unto him, O [Pray,] my Lord,<sup>2</sup> wherewith shall I save Israel? behold, my family is poor [the most insignificant] in Manasseh, and I am the least [youngest] in my father's house.

 16 And the Lord [Jehovah] said unto him, Surely [Nay, but] I will be with thee, and 17 thou shalt smite the Midianites as one man. And he said unto him, If now I have found grace in thy sight, then shew me a sign that [it is] thou [who] talkest with 18 me. Depart not hence, I pray thee, until I come [again] unto thee, and bring forth my present, and set it before thee. And he said, I will tarry until thou come again.
 19 And Gideon went in, and made ready a kid, and unleavened cakes of an ephah of flour: the flesh he put in a [the] basket, and he put the broth in a [the] pot, and 20 brought it out unto him under the oak, and presented it. And the angel of God said unto him, Take the flesh and the unleavened cakes, and lay them upon this
 21 [that] rock, and pour out the broth. And he did so. Then [And] the angel of the Lord [Jehovah] put forth the end of the staff that was in his hand, and touched the flesh and the unleavened cakes; and there rose up fire out of the rock, and consumed the flesh and the unleavened cakes. Then [And] the angel of the Lord
 22 [Jehovah] departed [disappeared] out of his sight. And when [omit: when] Gideon perceived that he was an angel of the Lord [Jehovah, and] Gideon said, Alas, O Lord God [Jehovah]! for because<sup>3</sup> I have seen an angel of the Lord [Jehovah]
 23 face to face. And the Lord [Jehovah] said unto him, Peace be unto thee; fear
 24 not: thou shalt not die. Then [And] Gideon built an altar there unto the Lord [Jehovah], and called it Jehovah-shalom [Jehovah (is) Peace]: unto this day it is yet in Ophrah of the Abi-ezrites.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 11. — Literally, "was beating" (יִצְרֹף) sc. with a stick, beßteig. The more usual word for threshing is יִצְרֹף. Threshing was generally done by treading with oxen, or by means of a drag-like machine drawn over the grain by oxen or other animals. But for small quantities, and for certain minor seeds (Isa. xxviii. 27), a stick was used, cf. Ruth ii. 17. — Ta.]

[2 Ver. 15. — יְהוָה: thus pointed, this word always refers to God, and the possessive suffix (for such יָ is most probably) is lost sight of. "From the words in ver. 15 Gideon perceived that he who talked with him was not a mere man. Hence, he now no longer says: 'Pray, my lord' (יְהוָה, ver. 18), but, 'Pray, Lord' (יְהוָה, God the Lord)." So Kell. Dr. Cassel apparently points the text here as in ver. 18, for he translates "My Lord." Compare what he says on ver. 17. — Ta.]

[3 Ver. 22. — וְעַתָּה: "for therefore," "for on this account." Dr. Cassel renders it here by also, "so then" (illative). But the phrase regularly indicates the ground or reason for what goes before, cf. Gen. xviii. 5; xix. 8; xxxiii. 10; etc.; and Ewald, Gram. 868 a. Gideon's thought is: "Woe is me! for therefore — scil. to give me cause for my apprehension of danger — have I seen," etc. Cf. Bertheau and Kell. The E. V. would be rendered accurate enough by striking out either "for" or "because." — Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Ver. 11. In Ophrah. The place is expressly designated as belonging to the family of Abiezer, to distinguish it from another Ophrah in Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 23). Abiezer was a son of Manasseh, whose seats were on this side the Jordan (Josh. xvii. 2). To the western half tribe of Manasseh, belonged also Beth-shean (Scythopolis), Jibleam, Taanach, Megiddo, the fertile districts of the plain of Jezreel. Manasseh therefore suffered especially, when the Midianites crossed the Jordan near Beisan, in order to desolate the land. From vers. 33-35 it may be inferred that Ophrah was situated in the northwestern part of the plain, in the direction of Dora, which likewise belongs to Manasseh. Since the enemy, after crossing the Jordan, encamped in Jezreel, and Gideon invoked assistance against them from Asher, Naphtali, and Zebulun, this inference may be considered tolerably certain. That Asher was called on, shows that Ophrah was in the West, and the appeal to Naphtali and Zebulun indicates that it lay to the north; since otherwise the army of Midian would have prevented a junction. Ophrah was inhabited by a branch of the family of Abiezer, at whose head Joash stood; but among them dwelt others (יְהוָה עִירָא, "the men of the city," ver. 27), who were probably of the original inhabitants whom Manasseh had suffered to remain.

Under the oak, יְהוָה עִירָא. Septuagint:

terebinthos (interchangeable with quercus), the terebinth. The Targums have אֵילָן, oak. אֵילָן and אֵילָן are evidently different species of the same stately tree, and probably differ from each other as the quercus and ilex. The oak and terebinth are too little alike to make it probable that they had almost the same name. Ilex is clearly a cognate term. Böttiger's remarks about an "ancestral terebinth," and a "sacred tree" under which "Jehovah appears" (Baumkultus der Hebräer, p. 521), have no support in the passages in which those trees are mentioned. The magnificent tree afforded a grateful shade, and therefore invited persons to sit and rest beneath it. Whoever knows the East, knows also how to estimate the value of shade;<sup>1</sup> though indeed everywhere a large tree near a homestead or in a village, becomes the meeting and resting-place of the inhabitants as well as the traveller. Besides, the tree in Ophrah has nothing whatever to do with what farther happens. The whole section in Böttiger's book is a misunderstanding. The tree is mentioned here only to make it appear natural that a stranger could seat himself under it without drawing special attention and exciting surprise.

And his son Gideon was threshing wheat in the wine-press. In German, also, "wine-press" (Keller) sometimes stands for the place in which the pressing is done, as well as for the vat into which the wine flows. The same is the case in Hebrew. While בֵּית is the press-house or place, בֵּית stands for the vat; but they are frequently interchanged. Here it is of course the place, of which Gideon makes use to thresh wheat; threshing on exposed threshing-floors being avoided on account of the pillaging propensities of the Midianites. Here that had again come to pass which Deborah lamented, and the cure of which she had celebrated in her song — there was no בֵּית, no open country, in the land.

Vers. 12, 13. And the Angel of Jehovah appeared unto him. Hitherto מַלְאָכֵי יְהוָה always signified a human messenger of God (cf. ch. ii. 1; v. 23). Here it is otherwise. The mention of a "prophet of Jehovah" in ver. 8, already indicated that the מַלְאָכֵי now spoken of, is not a human messenger. That hint is now rendered plain and unmistakable by the phrase וַיֵּרָא אֵלָיו, there "appeared" to him, which is only used when the invisible divine nature becomes visible. As Gideon looked up, a stranger stood before him, — who, while exhibiting nothing unusual in his outward appearance, must yet have had about him that which commanded reverence. This stranger greeted him.

Jehovah (is) with thee, thou valiant hero. Gideon cannot have referred this greeting merely to heroic deeds of war. It is much rather the evident pleasure of the stranger in the nervous energy and vigor with which he threshes, to which with a sense of shame he replies. True, indeed, he is conscious of strength and energy; but of what avail are they? Is it not matter of shame that he cannot even thresh his wheat on the threshing-floor? Hence his respectfully spoken answer: No, my lord; God is not with me; for were He with us, would such things come upon us? would I be driven to thresh wheat in the wine-press? But this answer shows that he believed God; from the greeting (וַיֵּרָא) he had perceived that he stood in the presence of one of the friends and confessors of God. It shows, also, that his courageous heart had long demurred against Israel's dishonor. The national tradition of Israel's ancient glory was not yet extinct. The deliverance from Egypt was the beginning of Israel's nationality and freedom. Doubtless, says the strong man, then, as our fathers tell us, God was with Israel, and freed us from Egypt; but now — we are unable to defend ourselves against the pillaging Bedouins! The doubt which he thus utters, does not spring from an unbelieving and pusillanimous soul. He gladly believed and delighted in what was told of other days. His lament is that of a patriot, not of a traitor. Because such is his character, he has been found eligible to become the deliverer of Israel. The Angel therefore comes to him, and says: —

Vers. 14–16. Go thou in this thy strength? . . . do not I send thee? The difference between Gideon's call and that of former heroes, must be carefully observed. Of Othniel it is said, that the "Spirit of Jehovah" was with him; Ehud is "raised up" to be "a deliverer;" Barak is called through the prophetess. The latter hero does not immediately proceed to victory. He refuses to go, unless Deborah go with him. In Gideon's case much more is done. An angel of God assumes the human form in order to call him. He condescends to work miracles before him. How much more, apparently, than Deborah had to contend with, must here be overcome by the angel! The grounds of this difference have been profoundly indicated in the preceding narrative. What was the all-important qualification demanded of one who should be a deliverer of Israel? Decided and undivided faith in God. Faith in God was the root of national freedom in Israel. Whatever energy and enthusiasm the love of country called out among the Greeks and Romans; that, faith in God called out in Israel. Israel existed in God, or not at all. The hero, therefore, who would fight for Israel, must thoroughly believe in God. This faith, undivided, unwavering, not looking to earthly things, and unconcerned about life or danger — a perfect unit with itself in devotion to God, and therefore hostile to the idol gods, the representatives of the enemies — this faith the call must find in him whom it selected for the work of deliverance. The men hitherto called did not come from the same tribes. Othniel was of Judah; Ehud of Benjamin. In these tribes, the worship of the true God was less mixed with that of the false gods, because here the old inhabitants had been obliged to yield. Barak was of Naphtali, where idolatry, though existing in many places along side of the true worship, did certainly not prevail as in Manasseh. Precisely those places which constituted the richest portion of this half tribe, and which consequently suffered most from the inroads of Midian, namely, the cities of the plain, had never, as the narrator expressly recorded, been vacated by the original inhabitants. They had continued to dwell in Beth-shean, Taanach, Megiddo, Jibleam, and Dor (ch. i. 27). Here altars of Baal raised themselves everywhere, fully authorized and perfectly unrestrained. Amid such surroundings, the demonstrative "this" refers to the strength now imparted to him through the divine promise. — Th.]

position of the faithful is a difficult one at all times, but especially in evil days, when Baal seems to triumph. Their hearts become saddened; and the contrast between the former glory, in which they so gladly believe, and the present impotence, unmanly and confuses them. If the modest soul of Gideon is to be prepared for bold hazards in behalf of the truth of God, he must first be fully convinced that God is still what He was anciently in Israel; that He still works wonders, and in them reveals his love for the nation. In his home and in his city he is surrounded by idolatry. He, the youngest, is to assume an attitude of authority towards all. That he may do this boldly and confidently, the heavenly visitant must inspire him with a divine enthusiasm which shall rise superior to the suggestions of common prudence. [The way to this is opened by the promise, "But I will be with thee!" which is at the same time a challenge to test the speaker. — Ta.] The narrative could not, in so few sentences, teach the love of God, which will thus be tested, more beautifully. Gideon is no presumptuous doubter. It is his humility that requires the miracle. He builds no expectations on his personal strength. If God will show that He is truly "with him," he is ready to do everything. He asks much, because he deems himself altogether insufficient.

Vers. 17. Then give me a sign that thou art He who talketh with me. The angel appeared to Gideon as man; otherwise he could neither have seen him, nor offered him food. His appearance must have been venerable; for Gideon always addresses him deferentially and humbly, with the words יְיָ אֱלֹהֵי, "Pray, my lord." Now, when this stranger says, "I send thee — I will be with thee," and that without adding who He is, Gideon could hardly fail to conclude that He who addressed him was a supernatural being; especially as these words were used in answer to his own, "if Jehovah were with us." It is, therefore, very instructive that the doubtful Gideon asks for a sign to know "whether thou art he who speaks with me," i. e., whether thou art one who can say, "I am with thee," and not to know "whether thou art God," a thought which he is not yet prepared to entertain.

Vers. 18-20. Depart not hence, I pray thee, until I come again unto thee. Gideon is not yet convinced; but nevertheless the word that has been spoken burns within him. The remark in

ver. 14, "יְיָ אֱלֹהֵי," and Jehovah turned towards him," was doubtless intended to intimate that the heavenly visitant turned his face, beaming with the light of holiness, full upon Gideon. Gideon feels the breath of divinity, — but certain he is not. Should the apparition now depart, he would be in twofold dread. He will gladly do whatever is commanded — but, is the commander God? He thinks to solve this question by means of the duties of hospitality which devolve on him. Hence he prays him to remain, until he has entertained him. He is not so poor, but that he can offer a kid and something more to a guest. Flocks of goats still form a considerable part of Palestinian wealth, and find excellent pasturage in the plain of Jezreel. Time permits Gideon to prepare only unleavened cakes; but the supply is bountiful, for he uses an ephah (i. e., a measure containing about 1994, according to others 1985, or only 1014, Par. cubic inches, cf. Böckh, Metrologische Untersuchungen, p. 261) of flour in their preparation. That which appears singular, is the statement that he put the flesh in the basket (סֵל). Wherever else this word occurs, it denotes a bread-basket. The explanation is, that Gideon was unwilling to call a servant, and hence used the basket for both bread and meat. He requires, however, a separate "pot" for the broth, which the basket cannot hold. He thinks now that by this meal he will learn to know his guest. Celestials, according to popular belief, took no earthly food. The angel who appears to Manoa, says (ch. xiii. 16): "I will not eat of thy bread." True, of the angels who came to Abraham (Gen. xviii. 8), it is said, "and they did eat;" but the Targum explains, "they seemed to him to eat."<sup>1</sup> This belief has no resemblance to the Homeric conception, according to which the gods, though they eat not bread or drink wine (Iliad, v. 341), do nevertheless, like mortals, stretch forth their hands after ambrosia and nectar. The angels, like all that is divine in the Bible, have their spiritual abode in heaven, with nothing earthly about them, consequently with no corporeal wants. The explanation of Ps. lxxviii. 25, as if לֶחֶם אֱנִיִּים meant bread such as angels feed on, is erroneous (unhappily, it has been again put forth by Böhm, in Herzog's Realencykl. iv. 20); the words have long since been properly explained (by Hengstenberg and Delitzsch) of the manna, which came from heaven, i. e., from on high. Hence, as late as the author of Tobias, the angel is made to say (Tob. xii. 19): "I have neither eaten nor drunk, but ye have seen an apparition." Nor did Gideon err in his expectations. His guest does not eat.

In verse 20, אֵלֹהִים הָאֵלֹהִים once takes the place אֱלֹהֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל; but the rule that in the Book of Judges Jehovah stands regularly for the God of Israel, Elohim for the gods of the heathen, is not thereby destroyed. This is shown by the article prefixed to Elohim. The reason for the interchange in this passage lies in the fact that the nature of the angel, as a divine being, here begins to declare itself. In order to describe the angel who speaks to Gideon as the messenger of that unity from which the multitude of the angels proceeds (hence אֱלֹהִים), the narrator introduces the term הָאֱלֹהִים. He thereby explains how the angel in his individual appearance, can nevertheless contain in himself the power of God. The Angel of Jehovah, he means to say, is none other than an angel of the Elohim; hence, He, the messenger, speaks as Jehovah.

Vers. 21-24. And the Angel of Jehovah put forth the end of his staff. The angel, like a traveller, but also like the prophets, like Moses and Elijah, carried a staff. They also used it, as he does, to work miracles. Among the Greeks likewise, the staff, in the hands of Æsculapius and Hermes, for instance, is the symbol of the divine power to awaken and subdue.<sup>2</sup> The angel touches not to be adduced, for angels before Christ were not born like Christ.

the flesh and bread, and they ascend in fire. What was brought as a gift to the guest, is accepted by fire as a sacrifice. Fire is the element in which divine power and grace reveal themselves. A flame of fire passed between the parts of Abraham's sacrifice (Gen. xv. 17). Fire came down on the offerings of Solomon, when he had made an ard of praying, and consumed them (2 Chron. vii. 1). Fire fell from heaven in answer to Elijah's prayer that the Lord would make it manifest that He was God in Israel, and consumed the sacrifice before the eyes of the rebellious people (1 Kgs. xviii. 38). To give a similar sign, the angel now touched the flesh and cakes. By the fire which blazed up, and by the disappearance of his visitor, Gideon perceived that his guest was actually a celestial being, who had called down fire from above. He was perfectly convinced. No doubt could any longer maintain itself, and in place of it fear seized upon him.

And Gideon said, Ah Lord Jehovah! Gideon makes this exclamation, because, like Manoaah (ch. xiii. 22), he thinks that he must die; for he has seen what ordinarily no living man does see. This view is deeply rooted in the Israelitish idea of God, and directly opposed to Hellenic conceptions. In fact, heathenism, as pantheism, knows of no real partition-wall between the individual gods and men (cf. Nägelsbach, Homer. Theologie, p. 141); but between the God who inhabits the invisible and eternal, and man who dwells in the world of sense, there was seen to be an absolute difference. Every human being is too sinful, and too much under the dominion of sense, to endure the immediate glory of the Incomprehensible. He cannot see God, to whom "to see" means to receive the light of the sun into eyes of flesh. When, therefore, Moses, notwithstanding that he spake with God, as friend converses with friend (Ex. xxxiii. 11), would see his glory, the answer was (ver. 20): "Thou canst not see my face; for no man sees me, and continues to live." It is implied in this idea, that only the living man cannot see God, that to see Him is to die. That, therefore, the dead can see Him, is an inference close at hand, and important for the O. T. doctrine concerning the soul and immortality. — Gideon, however, has no cause for lamentation, for after all he has only seen the man. Jacob's life also was preserved, for his wrestling had been with "the man" (Gen. xxxii. 24, 31 (30)). "No man hath seen God at any time" (John i. 18). When, therefore, Philip says, "Show us the Father," Jesus answers: "He that hath seen me, hath seen the Father" (John xiv. 9). Hence, a voice is heard — the voice of the now unseen God — saying: "Fear not; thou shalt not die!" It was for the very purpose that Gideon might live, that the angel had not appeared as God. The wife of Manoaah wisely draws this same conclusion herself (ch. xiii. 23). And God speaks "Peace" to him. Where peace is; there is no occasion for fear; for peace is the fruit of reconciliation. The divine messenger did not come to punish Israel still further, but to bring them help. When He comes to save, He must have previously forgiven. This forgiveness is the "peace." So Gideon understands it, when he builds an altar, and calls it יהוה שלום, God-Peace, i. e., the Peace of God. Humility and penitence prompt him to this. Above, in ver. 13, when he was not yet certain that God had appeared to him, he had said nothing to indicate that it was Israel's own fault that God was not with them. Of this he becomes conscious while standing in the presence of the divine messenger. The fear that to see God involves death, rests first of all on the moral ground of conscious sinfulness. Undoubting faith is ever followed by true repentance, namely, love for truth. Gideon builds his altar to the Peace of God, i. e., to his own reconciliation with God, and salvation from the judgment of God.<sup>1</sup> The narrator seizes on this penitential feeling of Gideon's, to which he joyfully consecrated his altar, and by means of it continues the thread of his story. The altar was known to the author as still extant in his time.

• HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Israel repented, and God's compassion renewed itself. Manifold as nature is the help of God. It is not confined to one method; but its wonders become greater as Israel's bondage becomes more abject. It was a great thing to select a woman to be the deliverer of Israel. This woman, however, had grown up in the Spirit of Jehovah; she was a prophetess already, accustomed to counsel the people. The choice of Gideon was therefore still more extraordinary. He was not only the youngest in the least family, but he belonged to a city in which the heathen had for the most part remained. Idolatry prevailed, invading even his father's house. God took him like a brand from the fire, to make him the deliverer of his people.

So God converted his Apostle, from amidst the multitude of enemies and their plots, on the way to Damascus. So Luther went forth from his cloister to preach the gospel of freedom. God calls whoever He will, and no school, faculty, or coterie, limits the field of his election.

STARKE: When we think that God is farthest from us, that in displeasure He has entirely left us, then with his grace and almighty help He is nearest to us. — THE SAME: Even in solitude the pious Christian is not alone, for God is always near him.

God does not err in his calling. Gideon was the right man, though he himself did not believe it. He desires a sign, not from unbelief, but humility. He who thus desires a miracle, believes in miracles. He desires it not to be a proof of God, but of himself. To him the censure of Jesus does not apply: "Except ye see signs and wonders, ye will not believe;" for those wished them as grounds of faith in Jesus, Gideon as evidence that himself was the right man. Gideon's humility was evidence of his strength. — HEDINGER: Conceit and pride do not lead man to God, but humility and lowliness do.

Thus Gideon believed the angel whom he beheld vanishing toward heaven; the Jews did not believe Jesus, when He wrought miracles and rose from the dead. But Gideon's eye was the humility with which he looked at himself. When Christians do not believe, it is because of pride which does not see itself. It is not for want of a theophany that many do not believe; for all have seen angels, if their heart be with God. "For the angel of the Lord encampeth round about them that fear Him, and delivereth them" (Ps. xxxiv. 8).

STARKE: Even the strongest faith has always something of weakness in it. — LISCO: From ver. 14 Gideon seems already to have perceived who it was that spake with him. His answer is the language not so much of unbelief as of modesty. — GERLACH: His prayer was not dictated by unbelief, but by a childlike, reverential acknowledgment of the weakness of his faith, as in the case of Abraham.

[Bp. HALL (ver. 11): What shifts nature will make to live! O that we could be so careful to lay up spiritual food for our souls, out of the reach of those spiritual Midianites! we could not but live in despite of all adversaries. — THE SAME (ver. 13): The valiant man was here weak, weak in faith, weak in discourse, whilst he argues God's absence by affliction, his presence by deliverances, and the unlikelihood of success by his own inability — all gross inconsequences. — SCOTT: Talents suited for peculiar services may for a time be buried in obscurity; but in due season the Lord will take the candle from "under the bushel," and place it "on a candlestick," to give light to all around; and that time must be waited for, by those who feel their hearts glow with desires of usefulness which at present they have no opportunity of executing. — TR.]

CHAPTER VI. 25-32.

25 And it came to pass the same [that] night, that the Lord [Jehovah] said unto him, Take thy father's young [ox] bullock, even [and]<sup>1</sup> the second bullock of seven years old, and throw [pull] down the altar of Baal that thy father hath, and
26 cut down the grove [Asherah] that is by [upon] it: And build an altar unto the Lord [Jehovah] thy God upon the top of this rock [fortification], in the ordered place,<sup>2</sup> and take the second bullock, and offer a burnt-sacrifice with the wood of the 27 grove [Asherah] which thou shalt cut down. Then [And] Gideon took ten men of his servants, and did as the Lord [Jehovah] had said unto him: and so it was, because he feared his father's household, and the men of the city, that he could 28 not do it by day, that he did it by night.<sup>3</sup> And when the men of the city arose early in the morning, behold, the altar of Baal was cast down, and the grove [Asherah] was cut down that was by [upon] it, and the second bullock was offered
29 upon the altar that was built. And they said one to another, who hath done this thing? And when [omit: when] they inquired and asked [searched], [and] they
30 said, Gideon the son of Joash hath done this thing. Then the men of the city said unto Joash, Bring out thy son, that he may die: because he hath cast down the altar of Baal, and because he hath cut down the grove [Asherah] that was by 31 [upon] it. And Joash said unto all that stood against [about] him, Will ye plead [contend] for Baal? will ye save him? he that will plead [contendeth] for him, let him be put to death whilst it is yet morning;<sup>4</sup> if he be a god, let him plead [contend] for himself, because one [he] hath cast down his altar. Therefore on that 32 day he [they] called him Jerubbaal, saying, Let Baal plead [contend] against him, because he hath thrown down his altar.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 25. — Bertheau and Wordsworth also find two bullocks in the text. "The original text," says the latter, "seems clearly to speak of two bullocks, and the ancient versions appear to distinguish them (see Sept., Vulg., Syriac, Arabic)." De Wette and Bunsen, too, render "and," not "even." Kell argues, that "if God had commanded Gideon to take two bullocks, He would surely also have told him what he was to do with both." But does He not tell him plainly enough in the words, "and pull down the altar of Baal?" See the commentary, below. — TR.]

[2 Ver. 26. — פניו. Our author's translation of this word, "on the forward edge," is too precarious to allow of its introduction into the text. It probably means: "with the arrangement of wood" (cf. below). On the use of פניו in this sense, see Ges. Lex., s. v., B. 2, a. — TR.]

[3 Ver. 27. — The E. V. is singularly awkward here. Dr. Cassel: "and as, on account of the house of his father and the men of the city, he feared to do it by day, he did it by night." — TR.]

[4 Ver. 31. — Dr. Cassel translates the foregoing clause thus: "he that contendeth for him, let him die! Wait till morning;" etc. Kell interprets similarly. — TR.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Ver. 25. And it came to pass that night. "Ye have honored false gods instead of the eternal God," the prophet had said above, "and therefore are come under the yoke." For apart from its God, the maintenance of Israel's nationality is an unnecessary thing. If they attach themselves to the gods of the nations, they must also wear their fetters. Only when they believe the Eternal is freedom either necessary or possible. The war against the oppressors, must begin against the gods of the oppressors. Gideon, fully convinced of the truth of Israel's God, cannot summon to battle against the enemy, while an altar of Baal stands in his father's own village. Israel's watchword in every contest is, "God with us;" but before that word can kindle the hearts of the people, it must have been preceded by another — "Down with Baal!" This truth God himself enunciates in the valiant soul of Gideon. For now, being wholly filled with divine fire, he will delay no longer. But, only he who fears not Baal will find confidence among the people. The vigorous blows of his axe against the Asherah are the clearest proofs of his own faith. Such a faith kindles faith. Accordingly, Gideon must begin the liberation of Israel in his own house. Whoever will be truly free, must commence with himself and by his own fire-side — that is truth for all ages.

Take the ox-bullock, etc. Under divine inspiration, Gideon is as energetic as he is prudent. He neither delays, nor hastens overmuch. He chooses night for what he has to do, not from cowardice, but to insure a successful issue. By day, an outcry and contest would be inevitable, and would terrify the undecided. An accomplished fact makes an impression, and gives courage. His task is a twofold one: he must first tear down, then build up. The abominations of Baal must be thrown down. The altars of Baal, as the superior sun-god, were located on heights or elevated situations. They were built of stone, sometimes also of wood or earth (2 Kgs. xxiii. 15), and were of considerable massiveness. Erected upon them, "planted" (לִּנְטֵץ, Deut. xvi. 21), stood a tree, or trunk of a tree, covered with all manner of symbols. This was consecrated to Astarte, the fruitful, subordinate night-goddess. Such an image was that of Artemis in Ephesus, black (like the earth), fastened to the ground, and full about the breasts, to symbolize the fostering love of the earth. In other places, where the Greeks met with similar figures, Sparta, Byzantium, and elsewhere (cf. Gerhard, Griech. Mythol. § 332, 4, vol. i. p. 343), they were dedicated to Artemis Orthia, or Orthosia. In this name (ὄρθος, straight), that of the Asherah (from אֶשְׁרָה, to be straight) was long since recognized (cf. Zorn, Biblioth. Antiquar., p. 383). Asherah was the straight and erect idol of Astarte; the symbol of her sensual attributes. Its phallic character made it the object of utter abhorrence and detestation to the pure and chaste worship of Jehovah. And in truth the worship at Sparta (Paus. iii. 16, 7) did not differ essentially from that on Mt. Carmel (1 Kgs. xviii. 28). This idol was a common ornament of the altars of Baal,<sup>1</sup> by means of which these represented the worship of nature in its completeness. Hence it is, that we find Baal and Astarte joined together, as well as Baal and Asherah. Accordingly, Asherah and Astarte are not indeed altogether identical, as was formerly supposed; but neither are they, as Movers thought (Phoenix i. 561, etc.), different divinities. Asherah was the Astarte Orthia, the image which expressed the ideas represented by the goddess; but it was not, and need not be, the only image of the goddess. Without adducing here the many passages of Scripture in which Asherah and Astarte occur, the foregoing observations may suffice to explain every one of them. It will be found, upon reviewing them, that while persons could indeed worship Astarte, it was only Asherah which they could make for themselves, and again destroy. In form and idea, Baal and Astarte presented the perfect contrast to the living and creative God. Gideon, therefore, if he is to build up Israel anew, must begin with the overthrow of their idols. But this was not so slight an undertaking as to be within his own sole powers of execution. He needs men and carts for the purpose. He must wrench the altar of Baal out of its grooves, and throw it down; tear out the Asherah, and cut it to pieces. In their place (this is expressed by the וְהָיָה, "this," of ver. 26), he is to erect an altar to the Eternal God. For this he cannot use the polluted fragments of the altar of Baal. He must bring pure earth and stones with him, out of which to construct it. Hence he uses ten servants to assist him, and a cart.

Take the ox-bullock which belongs to thy father, etc. The altar of Baal had been erected on his father's estate. The guilt of his father's house must be first atoned for. Therefore his cattle are to be taken. וְהָיָה, ox-bullock, is not a young bullock, and does not answer to בָּקָרָא. It is rather the first bullock of the herd, the "leader;" for even the second, being seven years old, is no longer young. Hesiod advises agriculturists to provide themselves two plough-bullocks of nine years old (Works and Days, 447). In Homer, bullocks of five years are offered and slaughtered (Il. ii. 403; Odys. xix. 420). Down to the present day, the bullock of the plain of Jezreel and the Kishon surpasses, in size and strength, the same animal in the southern parts of the land (cf. Ritter, xvi. 703). This first bullock, this head of the herd, answers in a sense to the head of the family, which is Joash; it must help to destroy the altar which belongs to the latter. But as Gideon is not simply to destroy, but also to build up, the second bullock must also be taken, to be offered upon the new altar, in a fire made of the wood of the Asherah. The flames for which the idol must furnish the material — and we may thence infer how considerable a log of wood it was, — must serve to present an offering to the Eternal God.<sup>2</sup>

Vers. 26–29. On the top of the fortification, on the forward edge, עַל רֹאשׁ הַמְּצוֹד, : not the rock, near which God first appeared to Gideon. It was stated at the outset, that Israel made themselves grottos, caves, and fortifications against the

made a priest for the occasion — as Manoah afterwards was (ch. xiii. 19) — by the special command of God, who shows his divine independence and sovereign authority by making priests of whom he will, and by ordering altars to be built where he will. Cf. Hengst., Pentateuch, ii. 48." — Ta.]

enemy. Some such place of protection and defense we are here to understand by the term מַעֲרֶכֶה. Upon this, the altar of Baal, the helper who could not help, had reared itself. In its place, an altar of the true Helper, the Eternal God, was now built, and placed מִפְּעֵרֶכָה, on the forward edge. This word occurs repeatedly in the first book of Samuel, in the sense of "battle-array." It answers to the Latin acies, and indicates that attitude of armies in which they turn their offensive sides toward each other; so that we are told (1 Sam. xvii. 21) that Israel and the Philistines had arranged themselves מִפְּעֵרֶכָה לְרֹאשׁ מִפְּעֵרֶכָה. Now, as acies came to signify battle-array because of the sharp side which this presented, so מִפְּעֵרֶכָה, as here used of the fortification, can only signify its forward edge.<sup>1</sup> The place where Gideon had to work was within the jurisdiction of Joash, but at some distance from the city, since otherwise the inhabitants would scarcely have remained ignorant of his proceedings till the next morning.

Ver. 30. And the men of the city said unto Joash. Although the altar belonged to Joash, the people of the city nevertheless think themselves entitled to sit in judgment on the insult offered to Baal. Baal worshippers are not tolerant. The disposition of Joash however, seems even before this to have been similar to that of Gideon. For when it is said that Gideon feared to do his work by day, among all those whom he considers, his father is not mentioned, though he must be the most directly concerned. The same inference may be drawn from the energetic and ironical answer which he gives the men of the city. There is nothing to support Bertheau's conjecture that Joash held the office of a judge. He is the head of the family; as such, he is required to deliver up Gideon, guilty of crime towards Baal. Joash is not merely indisposed to do this, but even threatens to use violence against any one who takes the cause of Baal upon himself. A few such forcible words were enough to quiet the people of the city. Israel had fallen into such deep torpidity and self-oblivion, that their enemies dared to demand of a father the life of his son, because he had done that which it was the duty of every Israelite to do. The first energetic resistance changes the position of parties, and puts the enemy to flight.

Ver. 31. And Joash said, Will ye contend for Baal? In a similar manner,<sup>2</sup> Lucian ridicules the heathenism of his day, by representing Jupiter as laughed at for letting the sacriligious thieves depart from Olympia, untouched by his thunderbolts, although they had cut from his statue the golden locks of hairs, each of which weighed six minæ in Jupiter Tragedus. It lies in the nature of heathenism to identify God and the symbol which represents Him, since in general whatever testifies of God, every sensible manifestation of Deity, is made Deity itself by it. Joash ridicules the idea of his heathen neighbors, that the destruction of his altar is an insult to Baal. (On the principles of heathenism, Baal's protection of his altar, or the contrary, will demonstrate whether he is or is not. If he is able to take care of his own altar, Joash mockingly argues, it is an insult for another to undertake it for him. In this case, not he who injures, but he who would defend his altar, denies his deity. The latter first deserves to die. Many expositors have connected עַד תִּבְקֹר, "till morning," with וַיָּמָת, "let him die," which is against the sense of Joash's speech. As to the destroyer of the altar, he says, we know not yet whether he has deserved death; wait till morning, and let us see whether Baal himself will do anything. But he who would take Baal's place, and put the other to death, he deserves punishment at once; for he denies that Baal has any power at all, and by consequence that he exists. Wait till morning, if he be a god, he will contend for himself, because he hath cast down his altar. Joash denies that the altar belonged to him, although ver. 25 states that it did. The altar, he says, belongs to its god: let him see to it. The result of these words must have been, to make it evident to the men of the city that Joash and his house would have nothing more to do with Baal. For this they knew full well, that their Baal would do nothing to Gideon. It is one of the characteristic illusions of heathenism in all ages, that it does not itself believe in that for which it spends its zeal.

Ver. 32. And at that time they named him Jerubbaal, that is, Baal will contend with him, for he hath thrown down his altar. Why expositors have not been content with this significant explanation, it is impossible to see.<sup>3</sup> It sets forth the utter impotence of Baal, and the mockery which it excited. Had Gideon been named "Contender with Baal," it would have implied the existence of Baal. But if he was called, "Baal will contend with him, avenge himself on him," and thus by his life, presence, and prosperity, strikingly manifested the impotence of the idol-god, who could not take vengeance on him, then his name itself was full of the triumph of the Israelitish spirit over its opponents. Baal can do nothing, Baal will do nothing, when his altars are overthrown. Baal is not: Israel has no occasion to fear. The superstition that he will avenge himself on his enemies, is idle. Of that, Jerubbaal affords living proof. In vain did Baal's servants wait for vengeance to overtake Gideon—it came not; the hero only becomes greater and more tri-

1 [Kau: "מִפְּעֵרֶכָה, 'with the preparation (Zurüstung).'] The explanation of this word is doubtful. Since פֶּרֶךְ is used (1 Kgs. xv. 22) with בָּ of the building material, Stüder and Bertheau understand מִפְּעֵרֶכָה of the materials of the overthrown Baal-altar, out of which Gideon was to build the altar to Jehovah—Stüder applying the word more particularly to the stone of the altar itself, Bertheau to the materials, especially the pieces of wood, lying on the altar, ready to be used in offering sacrifices.

But they are certainly wrong; for neither does מִפְּעֵרֶכָה mean building material or pieces of wood, nor does the definite article, which here precedes it, point to the altar of Baal. The verb פָּרַח occurs not only quite frequently of the arrangement of the wood upon the altar (Gen. xxii. 9; Lev. i. 7, and elsewhere), but also of the preparation of the altar for the sacrifice (Num. xxiii. 4). Accordingly,

umphant. The name is therefore of greater ethical significance, than has been generally supposed. This fact secured its perpetuation and popular use. Even believers in the eternal God are deeply imbued with superstitious fear of Baal, which forbids them to do anything against him. How idle this fear is, Gideon shows. Samuel in his farewell address speaks of Gideon as Jerubbaal (1 Sam. xii. 11); while Joab, speaking of Abimelech, calls him "son of Jerubbosheth" (2 Sam. xi. 21). יִרְבָּאֵל is a term of reproach for Baal (Hos. ix. 10).<sup>1</sup> Any connection between the name Jerubbaal and that of a god Jaribolos, discovered on Palmyrene inscriptions, is not to be thought of. First, for the self-evident reason, that no heathen god can possibly be called Jerubbaal; and secondly, because the like-sounding Jar can be better explained from יָרֵךְ, the moon, thus suggesting a moon-baal (cf. Corpus Insc. Græc. iii. n. 4502, etc.; Ritter, xvii. 1531, etc.). It is interesting to notice that Gideon's proper name, גִּדְעוֹן, appropriately expresses the act with which he began his career. גִּדְעוֹן is equivalent to the Latin caedere, to fell. Deut. vii. 5 says: "Their altars ye shall throw down, . . . their asherahs ye shall fell (יִרְבָּאֵל), cf. Deut. xii. 3). The same word is used (2 Chron. xiv. 2; xxxi. 1) of the felling of the Asherah, and Isa. ix. 9, of the felling of trees. Gideon, therefore, is the Feller, Cæsar (Cæsar).

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

After the miracle of his election, Gideon enters on his calling. Othniel begins his official career in battle, Gideon in his own house. He must test at home his courage against foes abroad. Before he can proclaim the call of God against the enemies of Israel, who are inflicted on account of the prevalent idolatry, he must throw down the altar of Baal in his father's house. The most difficult battle is to be fought first. Nearest neighbors are the worst adversaries. But he dares it because he believes God, and wins. So, when preachers of the gospel reap no fruit and gain no victory, it is often because they have not yet overthrown the altars in their own houses. The road to the hearts of the congregation, is over the ruins of the minister's own Baal. — STARKE: Christian friend, thou also hast a Baal in thine own heart, namely, evil concupiscence. Wilt thou please the Lord, first tear that idol down.

But Gideon must not merely tear down, but also build up; not only destroy the old altar, but also sacrifice on the new. Tearing down is of itself no proof of devotion; for an enemy's enemy is not always a friend. The spirit that only denies, is an evil spirit. Divine truth is positive. Building involves confession; hence, to build up (edify) is to proclaim our confession and to preach the gospel of Him who is Yea and Amen. So did the Apostle not merely undermine the idolatry of Diana, but build up the church in Ephesus. Boniface, the Apostle of the Germans, not only cut down the oaks of heathenism, but founded churches. All churches are Gideon-altars, dedicated to Him who overthrew death, that He might build up the New Jerusalem. — STARKE: He who would truly reform, must not only abolish, but put something better in its place.

Gideon's sacrifice was to be consumed by the wood of the idol-image. The sole use which can be made of wooden gods, is to kindle a sacrifice to the true God. The wood was not unholy, but only the heart that fashioned it into an idol-image. The mountains on which the people worshipped were not unholy, but only the people who erected idols upon them. All sacrificial flames arise from the wood of idols previously worshipped. So the Apostle consumed his zeal as persecutor in the burning zeal of love. When the heart burns with longings after its Saviour, the flames consume the worldly idols which it formerly served. When prayer rises like the smoke of sacrifice, it springs from penitence in which old sins are burned to ashes.

Gideon is obedient to every direction, and is crowned with success. Notwithstanding apparent danger, obedience to God conducts only to happy issues. The most painful injunction is laid on Abraham; he obeys, and it turns to salvation. The enemies seek to slay Gideon; but they are sent home with derision. Gideon not only threw down the altar in his father's house, but also won his father's heart for God. So, confession of Christ often draws after it the hearts of parents. It is salvation, even if the first be lost. However late, if at last men only come to God! — LISCO: The father had evidently derived new courage from his son's bold exploit of faith, and declares war to the idolaters, if they touch his son. — GERLACH: The bold deed of the son inspired the father also with new faith and courage. Hence, in this strife, Joash dared to judge as faith demanded.

And Gideon was called Jerubbaal. The hero is the wonderful type of the militant church: militant, that is, against unbelief, not engaged in internal warfare. His name proclaimed that Baal is nothing and can do nothing; but that God's word is irresistible. Hence, it is a symbol of encouragement for all who confess the truth. He who fears and hesitates, does not love; but for him who has courage, Baal is vanished. Gideon threw down his altar, and built another for God, not for the stones' sake, but for Israel's benefit. Every Christian is a Jerubbaal, so long as instead of self-righteousness, he gives a place in his heart to the Cross. Thus, many in our days, who have more fear of man than courage in God, are put to shame by Jerubbaal. They exercise discretion, regard their position, look to their income, defer to superiors, and wish to please all, — but only he who seeks to please God alone, loses nothing and gains all. — STARKE: As names given to men in memory of their good deeds are an honor to them, so to their adversaries they are a disgrace. — GERLACH: Henceforth the life and well-being of Gideon became an actual proof of the nothingness of idolatry; hence he receives the name Jerubbaal from the mouth of his father.

[BP. HALL: The wood of Baal's grove must be used to burn a sacrifice unto God. When it was once cut down, God's detestation and their danger ceased. The good creatures of God that have been profaned to idolatry, may, in a change of their use, be employed to the holy service of their Maker. — WORDSWORTH: The Parthenons and Pantheons of heathen antiquity have been consecrated into Basilicas and Churches of Christ. — HENRY: Gid-

CHAPTER VI. 33-40.

33 Then [And] all the Midianites, and the Amalekites, and the children [sons] of the east were gathered together, and went over, and pitched [encamped] in the valley [plain] of Jezreel. But [And] the Spirit of the Lord [Jehovah] came upon 34 Gideon, and he blew a [the] trumpet; and Abi-ezer was gathered after him. And he sent messengers throughout all Manasseh; who also was gathered after him: and he sent messengers unto Asher, and unto Zebulun, and unto Naphtali; and 35 they came up to meet them.<sup>1</sup> And Gideon said unto God, If thou wilt save Israel by my hand, as thou hast said, Behold, I will [omit: will] put a fleece of wool in the [threshing] floor: and if the dew [shall] be on the fleece only, and it be dry upon all the earth [ground] besides, then shall I know that thou wilt save Israel by 36 my hand, as thou hast said. And it was so: for [and when] he rose up early on the morrow, and [he] thrust [pressed<sup>2</sup>] the fleece together, and wringed<sup>3</sup> the [omit: the] dew out of the fleece, a [the<sup>3</sup>] bowl-full of water. And Gideon said unto God, Let not thine anger be hot [kindled] against me, and I will speak but this once: let me prove [try], I pray thee, but this once with the fleece; let it now be dry 37 only upon the fleece, and upon all the ground let there be dew. And God did so that night: for [and] it was dry upon the fleece only, and there was dew on all the ground.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 35. — מִיִּזְרְעֵל, "to meet them," i. e., Gideon and the Manassites already in the field. Dr. Cassel (De Wette, also) substitutes "him." The LXX. change the number at the other end of the sentence, probably because they thought that the mountaineers of Asher and Naphtali, descending into the plain, did not make a good subject for מִיִּזְרְעֵל, to go up, and render: καὶ ἀνέβη εἰς οὐράνους αὐτῶν. As to what may be called the "military" meaning of מִיִּזְרְעֵל, cf. the Com. on ch. i. 1, p. 26. — Tr.]

[2 Ver. 38. — The words rendered "thrust together" and "wringed" by the E. V., are יִצֵּץ (from יָצַץ) and שָׁחַץ (from שָׁחַץ). Dr. Cassel translates the first by "wringing," the second by "pressing." The difference between them seems to be slight, if any. In the text, one clause expresses the action, the other the result. The primary idea of יִצֵּץ, according to Gesenius, is "to straiten, to bring into a narrow compass;" that of שָׁחַץ, "to suck." The action of wringing, though likely enough to be used by Gideon, is not expressed by either term. However, it lies nearer יִצֵּץ than שָׁחַץ. De Wette: Er druckte die Wolle aus, und presste Thau aus der Schur, etc. — Tr.]

[3 Ver. 38. — כֶּלֶח, "the bowl," namely, the one he used to receive the water. On the "bowl," compare our author's remarks on ch. v. 26. — Tr.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Vers. 33-35. It was high time that a new spirit bestirred itself in Israel. The Bedouin hordes already pressed forward again from the desert regions beyond the Jordan, and were settling down, like a heavy cloud, on the plain of Jezreel. Gideon, by his bold deed against Baal, and because the idol-god did nothing whatever to avenge the insult to its altar, had acquired authority and distinction among his people. As now the enemy who oppressed and plundered Israel was near, the Spirit of God filled him, literally, "put him on." What he had done against the altar of Baal in his father's house, that he would attempt against the enemy in the open field. He sounds the trumpet on the mountains. Though the youngest in his family, and that the least in Manasseh, the people obeyed his call, and ranged themselves under him (יִצֵּץ) — such power is there in one courageous deed, in the vigorous resolution of one man in a servile age. Even Asher, who had held back from Barak, furnished men. Nor were the brave sons of Zebulun and Naphtali wanting on this occasion. In a short time Gideon stood at the head of a not inconsiderable army.

Ver. 36. And Gideon said unto God. The success thus far enjoyed by Gideon, has not lifted him up. He cannot yet believe that he is called to conduct so great an undertaking. He is aware also of the dangers to which he exposes his house and country. True, the divine manifestation which roused his soul, is still acting on him. But time, even a few eventful days, envelops such memories in shadowy dimness. In his humility, he is seized by a longing for renewed certainty. He desires to be assured, whether it was indeed destined for him to become the deliverer. He has recourse to no superstitious use of the lot. He turns in prayer to the God who has already shown his wonders to him, and who, as angel, has conversed with him. Now, as in ver. 20, where the angel manifests his supernatural character, the narrator used Elohim, with the article, because from Jehovah alone, who is the true Elohim, the only one to whom this name justly belongs, angels proceed; so here again, when Gideon asks for a new sign, he makes him pray to "the Elohim," and continues to employ this term as long as he speaks of the miracle.

Vers. 37-40. Behold, I put a fleece of wool in the threshing-floor. The sign he asks for is such as would naturally suggest itself to a person in rural life. The holy land is favored with heavy, fertilizing dews, which impart to its fields that beautiful and juicy verdure, by which it forms so grateful a contrast with the dry and dewless steppes on which nothing but the palm grows (cf. Ritter, xv. 157; xvi. 42, etc. [Gage's Transl. ii. 164]). Wool, spread on the open threshing-floor, especially attracts the dew. Gideon proposes to consider it a divine affirmative sign, if only the wool absorb dew, while the ground around be dry. It takes place. He finds the wool wet; after wringing

(וַיִּצְרֹק), from צָרַק = צָרַק the fleece, and pressing it (וַיִּצְרֹק), from צָרַק = צָרַק, he can fill a whole bowl full with the water; the ground round about is dry. Though very remarkable, he thinks nevertheless, that it may possibly be explained on natural principles. Perhaps the dew, already dried up from the ground, was only longer retained by the fleece. In his humility and necessity for assurance, and in the purity of his conscience, which is known to God, he ventures once more to appeal to God. If now the reverse were to take place, leaving the wool dry and the ground wet, there could be no doubt that God had wrought a miracle. No other explanation would be possible. This also comes to pass, and Gideon knows now beyond all doubt, that God is with him. The natural of an uncommon depth of thought reveals itself in this choice of a sign for which the hero asks. Faith in God's omnipotence lies at its base. Such a request could only be made by one who knew that the whole creation was in the hands of God. Relying on the grace and power of God, he casts lots with the independent laws of nature. The childlike faith which animates him, sounds the depths of an unfathomable wisdom. Hence, in the ancient church, his miraculous sign became the type of the highest and most wonderful miracle known to the church, the birth of Jesus from the Virgin Mary. Origen already speaks of the advent of the Son of God as the fall of the divine dew. The development of this type in pictures and customs, I have elsewhere attempted to trace, whither I must here refer the reader (Weihnachten, p. 248, etc.).

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

GERLACH: Gideon does not "put on" the Spirit of the Lord, but the Spirit puts him on. He clothes him, as with a suit of armor, so that in his strength he becomes invulnerable, invincible.

[BP. HALL: Of all the instruments that God did use in so great a work, I find none so weak as Gideon, who yet of all others was styled valiant.

THE SAME: The former miracle was strong enough to carry Gideon through his first exploit of ruining the idolatrous grove and altar; but now, when he saw the swarm of the Midianites and Amalekites about his ears, he calls for new aid; and, not trusting to the Abiezrites, and his other thousands of Israel, he runs to God for a further assurance of victory. The refuge was good, but the manner of seeking it savors of distrust. There is nothing more easy than to be valiant when no peril appeareth; but when evils assail us upon equal terms, it is hard, and commendable, not to be dismayed. If God had made that proclamation now, which afterwards was commanded to be made by Gideon, "Let the timorous depart," I doubt whether Israel had not wanted a guide: yet how willing is the Almighty to satisfy our weak desires! What tasks is He content to be set by our infirmity!—KEIL: Gideon's prayer for a sign sprang not from want of faith in God's promise of victory, but from the weakness of the flesh, which paralyzes the faith and energy of the spirit, and often makes the servants of God so anxious and timorous that God must assist them by miracles. Gideon knew himself and his own strength, and that for victory over the enemy this would not suffice.—SCOTT: Even they who have the Spirit of God, and by the trumpet of the gospel call others to the conflict, cannot always keep out disquieting fears, in circumstances of peculiar danger and difficulty. In this struggle against involuntary unbelief, the Lord himself, the Author and Finisher of his people's faith, is their refuge; to Him they make application, and He will help them; and when they are encouraged, they will be enabled to strengthen their brethren.—BURN: The result went, 1. To illustrate the divine condescension. God, instead of being offended with his servant, kindly acceded to his request. A fellow creature who had given such solemn promises, would have been quite indignant at finding his veracity seemingly called in question. . . .

2. To show the efficacy of prayer. It was prayer that prevailed in this instance. With great humility and much tenderness of spirit, Gideon besought the divine interposition.—TR.]

CHAPTER VII. 1-8.

1 Then [And] Jerubbaal (who is Gideon) and all the people that were with him, rose up early and pitched [encamped] beside the well of Harod [near En-Harod]: so that [and] the host [camp] of the Midianites were [was] on the north side of 2 them by the hill of Moreh, in the valley.<sup>1</sup> And the Lord [Jehovah] said unto Gideon, The people that are with thee are too many for me to give the Midianites into their hands, lest Israel vaunt themselves against me, saying, Mine own hand 3 hath saved me. Now therefore go to, proclaim in the ears of the people, saying, Whosoever is fearful and afraid, let him return and depart early [turn away] from Mount Gilead. And there returned of the people twenty and two thousand; and 4 there remained ten thousand. And the Lord [Jehovah] said unto Gideon, The people are yet too many; bring them down unto the water, and I will try them for thee there; and it shall be that of whom I say unto thee, This [one] shall go with thee, the same shall go with thee; and of whomsoever I say unto thee, This [one] shall 5 not go with thee, the same shall not go. So he brought down the people unto the water: and the Lord [Jehovah] said unto Gideon; Every one that lappeth of the water with his tongue as a dog lappeth, him shalt thou set by himself; likewise every 6 one that boweth down upon his knees to drink. And the number of them that lapped, putting their hand to their mouth, were three hundred men: but all the rest 7 of the people bowed down upon their knees to drink water. And the Lord [Jehovah] said unto Gideon, By the three hundred men that lapped will I save you, and deliver the Midianites into thine hand: and let all the other people go every man 8 unto his place. So the people [And they] took [the] victuals [from the people] in their hand, and their trumpets;<sup>2</sup> and he sent all the rest of Israel every man unto his tent, and retained those three hundred men. And the host [camp] of Midian was beneath him in the valley.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[<sup>1</sup> Ver. 1. — Dr. Cassel, taking לִּי in the last clause of this verse (and also in ver. 8) as if it were לְפָנָיו, renders thus: "And he had the camp of Midian before him in the valley, to the north of the hill Moreh." The E. V. is more correct. Literally rendered, the clause says that "the camp of Midian was to him (Gideon) on the north, at (בְּ)ן, cf. Ges. Lex. s. v., 8, h) the hill of Moreh, in the valley." — Tr.]

[<sup>2</sup> Ver. 8. — On the rendering of this clause, see the commentary below. Kell translates similarly ("of the people," instead of "from the people"), and remarks: "הָעָם cannot be subject, partly on account of the sense — for the three hundred who are without doubt the subject, cf. ver. 16, cannot be called הָעָם in distinction of בְּנֵי-אִישׁ יִשְׂרָאֵל — partly also on account of the אֶת-הָעָם, which would then, against the rule, be without the article, cf. Ges. Gram. 117, 2. Rather read אֶת-יִצְרָאֵל הָעָם, as Sept. and Targum." So also Bertheau. — Tr.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Ver. 1. And they encamped near En Harod. The great probability that Ophrah is to be sought somewhere to the northwest of Jezreel (the modern Zerín), has already been indicated above. The battle also must be located in the same region, as appears from the course of the flight, related farther on. The camp of Midian was in the valley, to the north of a hill. Now, since we are told that Gideon's camp was on a hill (ver. 4), below which, and north of another, Midian was encamped, it is evident that Gideon occupied a position north of Midian, and had that part of the plain of Jezreel in which the enemy lay, below him, towards the south. The height near which the hostile army was posted, is called the Hill Moreh. Moreh (מֹרֶה, from יָרָה), signifies indicator, pointer, overseer and teacher. The mountain must have commanded a free view of the valley. This applies exactly to the Tell el Mutsellim, described by Robinson (Bibl. Res. iii. 117). He says: "The prospect from the Tell is a noble one, embracing the whole of the glorious plain, than which there is not a richer upon earth. It was now extensively covered with fields of grain; with many tracts of grass, like meadows; . . . Zerín (Jezreel) was distinctly in view, bearing S. 74° E." To this must be added that the Arabic Mutsellim has essentially the same meaning as Moreh, namely, overseer, district-governor, etc. The peculiar position of the Tell has probably given it the same kind and degree of importance in all ages. A little north of Tell Mutsellim, Robinson's map has a Tell Kireh, which may mark the position of Gideon; for that must have been very near and not high, since Gideon could descend from it and hurry back in a brief space of the same night. It may be suggested, at least, that Kireh has some similarity of sound with Charod (Harod).<sup>1</sup>

Ver. 2. The people that are with thee are too many. Victory over Midian, and deliverance from their yoke, would avail Israel nothing, if they did not gain the firm conviction that God is their Helper. The least chance of a natural explanation, so excites the pride of man, that he forgets God. Whatever Gideon had hitherto experienced, his vocation as well as the fulfillment of his petitions, was granted in view of his humility, which would not let him think anything great of himself. The number of warriors with which he conquers must be so small, that the miraculous character of the victory shall be evident to everybody. This belief in divine intervention will make Israel free; for not the winning of a battle, but only obedience toward God can keep it so.

Ver. 3. Whosoever is fearful and afraid, let him turn back and depart from Mount Gilead.<sup>2</sup> The narrative is evidently very condensed; for it connects the result of the proclamation immediately with God's command to Gideon to make it, without mentioning its execution by him. By reason of this brevity, sundry obscurities arise, both here and farther on, which it is difficult to clear up. The words וַיִּשָּׁב מִהָר הַגִּלְעָד, "and turn away from Mount Gilead," have long given offense, and occasioned various unnecessary conjectures. וַיִּשָּׁב, it is true, occurs only in this passage; but it is manifestly cognate with וַיִּפְרֹד, circle, crown. Hence, that the verb means to turn away or about, is certain, especially as the Greek σφαίρα, ball, sphere, must belong to the same root.<sup>3</sup> Gideon, in bidding the timorous depart, after the milder וַיִּשָּׁב, uses the somewhat stronger וַיִּפְרֹד: "let the fearful take himself off!"<sup>4</sup>

But what is meant by turning from "Mount Gilead?"<sup>5</sup> For Gilead is beyond the Jordan (ch. v. 17). It has therefore been proposed to read וַיִּפְרֹד, Gilboa, instead of וַיִּשָּׁב, Gilead, which would be a very unfortunate substitution. For, in the first place, the battle did not occur at Mount

Gilboa; and in the next place, by this reading the peculiar feature of the sentence would be lost. To be sure, Gilead does not here mean the country of that name east of the Jordan. Indeed, it does not seem to indicate a country at all, but rather the character of the militant tribe. Gideon belongs to the tribe of Manasseh. From Manasseh likewise descended Gilead, a son of Machir (Num. xxvi. 29); and the sons of Machir took possession of Gilead (Num. xxxii. 40). Nevertheless, the Song of Deborah distinguishes between Machir and Gilead. The name Machir there represents the peaceable character of the tribe: Gilead stands for its military spirit. Joshua xvii. 1 affirms expressly that Gilead was a "man of war." From Gilead heroes like Jephthah descend. Jehu also is reckoned to it.<sup>6</sup> The valor of Jabez Gilead is well known. In a bad sense, Hosea (ch. vi. 8) speaks of Gilead as the home of wild and savage men. Here, therefore, Gilead stands in very significant contrast with וַיִּפְרֹד: "let him," cries the hero, "who is cowardly and fearful depart from the mountain of Gilead, who (as Jephthah said) takes his life in his hand, untroubled before the foe."<sup>7</sup> For the rest, however, the name Gilead was not confined to the east-Jordanic country. This appears from ch. xii. 4, where we read that the Ephraimites called the Gileadites fugitives of Ephraim, "for Gilead was between Ephraim and Manasseh." Now, Ephraim's territorial possessions were all west of the Jordan. From this, therefore, and from the fact that the western half tribe of Manasseh and the tribe of Ephraim were partly interlocated (cf. Josh. xvii. 8-10), it is evident that the names of the eastern Gilead were also in vogue on this side the Jordan. He who would be with Gilead, must be no וַיִּפְרֹד (trembler): out of 32,000 men, 22,000 perceive this, and retire.

That numbers do not decide in battle, is a fact abundantly established by the history of ancient nations; nor has modern warfare, though it deals in the life and blood of the masses, brought discredit upon it. It is a fine remark which Tacitus (Annal. xiv. 36, 3) puts into the mouth of Suetonius: Etiam in multis legionibus, paucos esse qui prælia profligarent — "even with many legions, it is always the few who win the battle." The instance adduced by Serarius from Livy (xxix. 1), has no proper relation to that before us. It would be more suitable to instance Leonidas, if it be true, as Herodotus (vii. 220) intimates, that at the battle of

1 [Bertheau assumes that En Charod is the same fountain as the modern Ain Jâlûd, flowing from the base of Gilboa, see Rob. Bib. Res. ii. 323. Accordingly, Gilboa would be the mountain on which Gideon was encamped, and Little Hermon (on which see Rob. ii. 326) would answer to Moreh. On this combination Kell remarks, that "although possible, it is very uncertain, and scarcely reconcilable with the statements of ver. 28 ff. and ch. viii. 4, as to the road taken by the defeated Midianites." — Tr.]

2 Epaminondas, when advancing against the Spartans at Leuctra, observed the unreliable character of some confederates. To prevent being endangered by them, he caused it to be proclaimed, that "Whoever of the Boeotians wished to withdraw, were at liberty to do so." Polyænus, ii. 3.

3 Under this view, the conjectures adopted by Benfey (Gr. i. 579; ii. 387) fall away of themselves.

4 [The German is: "Wer feige sei, trolle sich vom Berge." The author then adds: "The German drollen, trolle, has in fact a similar origin. It means "to turn one's self;" drol is that which is turned, also a "coil." Sich trolle [English: to pack one's self], is proverbially equivalent to taking one's departure, recedere. Cf. Grimm, Wörterbuch, ii. 1429, etc." — Tr.]

5 Dathe proposes to read ad montem, and Michaëlis to point וַיִּפְרֹד, "quickly," instead of וַיִּשָּׁב, "from the mountain." Neither proposition can be entertained (cf. Döderlein, Theol. Biblioth., iii. 326).

6 [By the ancient Jewish expositors, cf. Dr. Cassel's article on Jehu in Herzog's Realencykl. vi. 468. "In so doing they probably explained son of Nimshi (נִמְשִׁי) as son of a Manassite (מָנַשֶׁה), i. e. a son out of the tribe of Manasseh." — Tr.]

7 [Ewald (Gesch. Israel's, ii. 500, note) has the following on this proclamation: "From the unusual words and their rounding, it is easy to perceive that they contain an ancient proverb, which in its literal sense would be especially appropriate to the tribe of Manasseh. • "Mount Gilead," the place of Jacob's severest struggles (Gen. xxxi. etc.), may very well, from patriarchal times, have become a proverbial equivalent for "scene of conflict," which is manifestly all that the name here means. And Manasseh was the very tribe which had often found that for them also Gilead was a place of battle, cf. p. 391." — Tr.]

Thermopylæ he dismissed his confederates because he knew them to be deficient in bravery; in relation to which, however, Plutarch's vehement criticism is to be considered (cf. Kaltwasser, in Plut. Moral. Abhandl., vi. 732). Noteworthy is the imitation of Gideon's history in a North-German legend (Müllenhoff, Sagen, etc. p. 426). In that as in many other legends, magic takes the place of God.

Vers. 4. Bring them down unto the water, and I will try them for thee there. There is no lack of water in this region. Ponds, wells, and bodies of standing water, are described by Robinson (Bibl. Res. iii. 115, 116). Beside these, Gideon had the Kishon behind him, which in the rainy season is full of water.

Vers. 5-7. Every one that lappeth of the water. The meaning of this test, the second which Gideon was to apply, is obscured by the brevity of the narrative. The question is, What characteristic did it show in the 300 men, that they did not drink water kneeling, but lapped it with their tongues, like dogs. Bertheau has followed the view of Josephus (Ant. v. 6, 3), which makes those who drink after the manner of dogs to be the faint-hearted. According to this view, the victory is the more wonderful, because it was gained by the timid and fearful. But this explanation does not accord with the traditional exegesis of the Jews, as handed down by others. Moreover, it contradicts the spirit of the whole narrative. When Gideon was chosen, it was for the very reason that he was a "valiant hero" (ch. vi. 12). All those who were deficient in courage were sent home by the proclamation (ver. 3). If faint-heartedness were demanded, the brave should have been dismissed. Finally, God saves by few, indeed, if they trust in Him, but not by cravens. Cowardice is a negative quality, unable even to trust. To do wonders with cowards, is a contradiction in adjecto; for if they fight, they are no longer cowards. Cowardice is a condition of soul which cannot become the medium of divine deeds; for even the valiant few, when they attack the many and conquer, are strong only because of their divine confidence. Besides, it is plainly implied that all those who now went with Gideon, were resolute for war. The Jewish interpretation, communicated by Raschi, is evidently far more profound. Gideon, it says, can ascertain the religious antecedents of his men from the way in which they prepare to drink. Idolators were accustomed to pray kneeling before their idols. On this account, kneeling, even as a mere bodily posture, had become unpopular and ominous in Israel, and was avoided as much as possible. Hence, he who in order to drink throws himself on his knees, shows thereby, in a perfectly free and natural manner, that this posture is nothing unusual to him; whereas those who have never been accustomed to kneel, feel no need of doing it now, and as naturally refrain from it. It would have been difficult for Gideon to have ascertained, in any other way, what had been the attitude of his men towards idolatry. While quenching their eager thirst, all deliberation being forgotten, they freely and unrestrainedly indicate to what posture they were habituated. It is a principle pervading the legendary lore of all nations, that who and what a person is, can only be ascertained by observing him when under no constraint of any kind.<sup>1</sup> The queen of a Northern legend exchanges dresses with her maid; but she who is not the queen, is recognized by her drinking (cf. Simrock, Quellen des Shakspe. iii. 171). That which is here in Scripture accepted with reference to religious life and its recognition, popular literature applies to the keen discriminating observance of social life. — This view of the mark afforded by the act of kneeling, is not opposed by the fact that in the temple the worshipper bowed himself before God. It is announced to Elijah (1 Kgs. xix. 18), that only 7,000 shall be left: "All the knees which have not bowed unto Baal, and every mouth which hath not kissed him." To bow the knee is an honor due to God alone. Hence, Mordecai refuses to kneel to a man (Esth. iii. 5). Hence, God proclaims by the prophet (Isa. xlv. 23): "Unto me every knee shall bow." The three hundred — this is what God makes Gideon to know — have never kneeled before Baal; they are clean men; and with clean vessels, men, and animals, God is accustomed to do wonderful things. Midian's idolatrous people shall be smitten only by such as have always been free from their idols.

However satisfactory and in harmony with the Biblical spirit this explanation may be as it stands, let something nevertheless be added to it. Verse 5 says: כָּל הַשֹּׁאֲבִים מִן הַמַּיִם בְּאֶזְרָתָם לֵאמֹר. In verse 6 the phraseology changes; it speaks of those who הִקְלָבְוּ בְּיָדָם אֶת-הַמַּיִם. Now, as they would naturally use the hollow hand to take up the water and carry it to the mouth, thus making it answer to the concave tongue of a dog, it is evident that we must so understand the words quoted from ver. 5, as if it read: כָּל הַשֹּׁאֲבִים מִן הַמַּיִם בְּאֶזְרָתָם, "all who sip water with their hands, as the dog with his tongue." However that may be, the circumstance must not be overlooked that a comparison with the sipping of a dog is here instituted; for if the comparison had no special significance, it would have sufficed to distinguish between those who drank standing and those who drank kneeling. It was the perception of this, doubtless, which induced the common reference to what Ælian (Hist. Anim. vi. 53) says of the dogs of Egypt, that for fear of crocodiles they drink quickly, while running. And from this arose the view, already confuted, that the three hundred who imitated the lapping of dogs, were spiritless and cowardly. But the comparison must be viewed more profoundly. Those Egyptian dogs are the type, not of cowardice, but of caution. It is known that the crocodiles of the Nile were not the only ones of their kind eager to seize on dogs; those of Central America (the Cayman alligator) are not less so. In Cuba, likewise, dogs will not drink from rivers, lest their greedy foe might suddenly spring on them (cf. Oken, Naturegesch., vi. 666). The crocodile is the image of the adversary; against whom they are on their guard, who do not so drink, that from eagerness to quench their thirst, they fall into his hands.<sup>2</sup> Sensual haste would forget the threatening danger. To these considerations, add the following:<sup>3</sup> The heroic achievement of the three hundred is a surprise, in which they throw them-siderate thirst for enjoyment, so often falls into the jaws of sin. The godly rejoice with trembling, and enjoy with watchfulness, that they may not become a prey to the enemy.

<sup>3</sup> The most remarkable confirmation of this narrative, selves, as it were, into the jaws of the sleeping foe. Now, the ancients tell of an animal, "similar to a dog," which, hostile to the crocodile, throws itself into the jaws of the reptile when asleep, and kills it internally. This animal, called Hydrus, or אֲדִרְיוֹן (cf. Phys. Syrus, ed. Tychsen, cap. xxxi. p. 170), has been rightly considered to be the Ichneumon, the crocodile's worst enemy. Its name signifies, "Tracker." Tracking, ἰχθυεῖν, is the special gift of dogs. Among five animals before whom the strong must fear, the Talmud (Sabbat, 77, b) names the דִּלְבִּית,<sup>1</sup> from דָּלַב, dog, as being a terror of the לִרְיוֹן, crocodile. The band who drink like the Egyptian dog, perform a deed similar to that which the dog-like animal has ascribed to it. They throw themselves upon the sleeper; and, courageous though few, become the terror of the mighty foe. If it may be assumed that for the sake of such hints the similitude of the sipping dog was chosen for the three hundred companions of Gideon, the whole passage, it must be allowed, becomes beautiful and clear. He who has never inclined to idolatry, who has exercised caution against hostile blandishments and mastered his own desires, — he, like the animal before alluded to, will be fitted, notwithstanding his weakness, to surprise and overcome the enemy, how strong soever he be. The similitude, in this view, is analogous to various other significant psychological propositions, expressive of fundamental moral principles.<sup>2</sup>

Ver. 8. They took the victuals from the people in their hands. The words of the original are: וַיִּקְחוּ אֶת-צֵדָה הָעָם בְּיָדָם. Offense has naturally been taken at צֵדָה: instead of which צֵנֶרֶת, in the stat. constr., was to be expected. The older Jewish expositors endeavored to support the unusual form by a similar one in Ps. xlv. 5, וַיִּצְנְנוּ; but the two are not exactly parallel, either in sense or form, to say nothing of Olshausen's proposal to emend the latter passage also. On the other hand, it is certainly surprising that צֵדָה is not found in a single manuscript, although it was so natural to substitute it in effect, as was done by the ancient versions. Nor is it clear that צֵדָה can be read.<sup>3</sup> It is not to be assumed that the three hundred men took all the provisions of the other thousands. It would be quite impossible to comprehend how the former were benefited by such superabundance, or how the latter could dispense with all means of subsistence. The sense can only be that the three hundred took their provisions out of the supplies for the whole army. As the great body of the army was about to leave them, this little troop took from the common stores as much as they needed. We are not therefore to correct צֵדָה into צֵנֶרֶת, but to supply בָּן before הָעָם. The matter is further explained by the addition בְּיָדָם. From the common stores of the supply-train, they took what they needed for themselves in their own hands, for the others were going away. The case was not much different with the trumpets. The three hundred needed one each; so many had therefore to be taken from the people. There is nothing to show, nor is it to be assumed, that the other thousands kept none at all, or that at the outset the whole ten thousand had only three hundred trumpets. The three hundred took from the body of the army what, according to their numbers, they needed to venture the battle. — The others Gideon dismissed, "every one to his tent." To be dismissed, or to go to the tents, is the standing formula by which the cessation of the mobile condition of the army is indicated. The people are free from military duty; but they do not appear to have entirely disbanded.

He retained the three hundred. With these he intended to give battle; and the conflict was near at hand, for the hostile army lay before him in the valley below.

STARKE: Christianity requires manliness; away, therefore, with those who always plead the weakness of the flesh. — THE SAME: It matters little how insignificant we are considered, if we only conquer. — THE SAME: We should regard, not the means which God uses for our physical and spiritual deliverance, but the God who uses them. — THE SAME: Though men do nothing, but only stand in the order appointed, God by his omnipotence can effect more than when they work their busiest. — GERLACH: God's genuine soldiers never seek their strength in numbers, nor ever weaken their ranks by the reception of half-hearted, slothful, and timorous persons. In times of peace, they may for love's sake hold fellowship with many; but when battle is to be waged for the Lord, it is necessary to get rid of all those who could only weaken the host.

[B. HALL: Gideon's army must be lessened. Who are so fit to be cashiered as the fearful? God bids him, therefore, proclaim license for all faint hearts to leave the field. An ill instrument may shame a good work. God will not glorify himself by cowards. As the timorous shall be without the gates of heaven, so shall they be without the lists of God's field. Although it was not their courage that should save Israel, yet without their courage God would not serve Himself of them. Christianity requires men; for if our spiritual difficulties meet not with high spirits, instead of whetting our fortitude, they quell it. — THE SAME: But now, who can but bless himself to find of two and thirty thousand Israelites, two and twenty thousand cowards? Yet all these in Gideon's march, made as fair a flourish of courage as the boldest. Who can trust the faces of men, that sees in the army of Israel above two for one timorous? — SCOTT: Many who have real faith and grace are unfit for special services, and unable to bear peculiar trials, from which therefore the Lord will exempt them; and to which He will appoint considered in its symbolic import, is found in a German legend, communicated by Birlinger (Volkstümliches aus Schwaben, i. 118), in which the she-wolf recognizes as genuine only those among her young who drink water, while she regards those who lap like dogs as young wolf-dogs, and her worst enemies. Accordingly, dogs who lap, in the

CHAPTER VII. 9-11.

9 And it came to pass the same night, that the Lord [Jehovah] said unto him, Arise, get thee down unto [descend against] the host [camp]; for I have delivered it into thine hand. But if thou [yet] fear to go down, go thou [art] with Phurah thy servant down to the host [camp]: And thou shalt hear what they say; and afterward shall thine hands be strengthened to go down unto [against] the host [camp]. Then went he down with Phurah his servant unto the outside of the armed men that were in the host [camp].

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Ver. 9. Arise, descend! The three hundred who are with Gideon are enough. The hero may venture the assault with them. The hosts of Midian, despite their numbers, will not withstand their enthusiasm of faith. Not fortune, but God, will help the brave. There is no more time for delay. The harvest waits for the reaper; of that Gideon may convince himself. Let him hear what they say, and he will learn that they are more in dread than to be dreaded. The command addressed to Gideon in this verse, bids him make a general assault with all his men (which Bertheau has failed to perceive). It is only when the undertaking still appears too venturesome to him, that he is bidden first to convince himself of the spirit which rules in the camp of Midian. Again and again does the narrative inculcate the lesson that victory results only from full, undivided, unbroken, and enthusiastic confidence. Every shadow of hesitation is removed by God, before the hero advances to his great exploit.

Ver. 10. Go thou with Phurah thy servant. The case of Diomed, who according to Homer (Il. x. 220), ventures into the camp of the Trojans, is not altogether analogous.<sup>1</sup> Diomed is to find out what the Trojans are doing, and design to do; Gideon is only to learn the spirit of his enemy, as they freely converse together. Diomed also desires a companion, "for two going together better observe what is profitable." Gideon's servant goes with him, not for this purpose, but that he also may hear what Gideon hears, and may testify to his fellow soldiers of what Gideon tells them, so that they may follow with the same assured courage with which he leads. The two commands are very clearly distinguished. Gideon with his troop were to advance "against" (אֶל, as in ch. v. 13) the encampment; but Gideon and his servant are to go "unto" (אֵלַי) it. — The name Phurah (פִּהְרָה), does not occur elsewhere. Pere (פֶּרֶה or פִּרְיָה) is a wild ass, onager, an animal much talked of and greatly dreaded among the Orientals. Here, however, the Masorites have pointed the same radicals פִּהְרָה; according to which the name of the servant, as signifying "Branch" (פִּתְרָה), was not unaptly chosen. — נָעַר means both boy and servant or attendant.

Ver. 11. As far as the line (limit) of the vanguard to the camp, אֶל־קִוְיָהָה הַחֲמִישִׁים. The meaning of אֶל־קִוְיָהָה is obscure, although the rendering of the LXX. at Josh. i. 14 affords a hint toward a probable explanation. קִוְיָהָה is the small of the back, above the hips (lumbus, lumbi, quinque inferiores spinæ vertebrae), about which the girdle, zona, was worn. The chamushim were not, however, simply those who were girdled and equipped, but as the LXX. indicate in the passage referred to, the εὐσώτοι, the well-girdled; which term the Greeks also used to designate the light-armed troops, who were everywhere in use as vanguard and rear guards. Among many passages in Herodotus, Thucydides, Xenophon, and others, it will be sufficient to quote the following from the Cyropaedia (v. 3, 56), as illustrating this use of the Greek word: "Οτι πρὸ πάντων τοῦ στρατεύματος πεσὺς εὐσώτους . . . προβήμεν." The same position as vanguard is, according to Josh. i. 14, occupied in the Israelitish host by the two and a half trans-Jordanic tribes: "Ye shall march before your brethren as chamushim." These tribes had left their families beyond the Jordan, and were therefore freer and lighter, expeditiores. To the same class of soldiery belonged the chamushim, to whom

CHAPTER VII. 12-25.

12 And the Midianites, and the Amalekites, and all the children [sons] of the east, lay along in the valley like grasshoppers [locusts] for multitude; and their camps were without number, as the sand by the sea-side for multitude. And when Gideon was come, behold, there was a man that told a dream unto his fellow, and said, Behold, I dreamed a dream, and lo, a [round] cake of barley-bread tumbled into [rolled itself against] the host [camp] of Midian, and came unto a [the] tent [i. e. the tents; the singular, used collectively], and smote it that it fell, and overturned it that the tent [i. e. all the tents] lay along. And his fellow answered, and said, This is nothing else save the sword of Gideon the son of Joash, a [the] man of Israel: for [omit: for] into his hand hath God delivered Midian, and all the host [camp]. And it was so, when Gideon heard the telling of the dream, and the interpretation thereof, that he worshipped, and returned into the host [camp] of Israel, and said, Arise; for the Lord [Jehovah] hath delivered into your hand the host [camp] of Midian. And he divided the three hundred men into three companies, and he put a trumpet in every man's hand, with empty pitchers, and lamps [torches] within the pitchers. And he said unto them, Look on me, and do likewise: and behold, when I come to the outside of the camp, it shall be that as I do, so shall ye do. When I blow with a [the] trumpet, I and all that are with me, then blow ye the trumpets also on every side of all the camp, and say, The sword of the Lord [Jehovah], and of Gideon. So Gideon, and the hundred men that were with him, came unto the outside of the camp in the beginning of the middle watch; and they had but newly set the watch: and they blew the trumpets, and brake the pitchers that were in their hands. And the three companies blew the trumpets [all at once], and brake the pitchers, and held [took] the lamps [torches] in their left hands, and the trumpets in their right hands to blow withal: and they cried, The sword of the Lord [Jehovah], and of Gideon. And they stood every man in his place round about the camp; and all the host [camp] ran [was thrown into commotion], and cried, and fled. And the three hundred blew the trumpets, and [meanwhile] the Lord [Jehovah] set every man's sword against his fellow, even throughout [and against] all the host [camp]: and the host [camp] fled to Beth-shittah [the House of Acacias] in [toward] Zererath [Zererah], and [omit: and] to the border [edge] of Abel-meholah, unto [near] Tabbath. And the men of Israel gathered themselves together out of Naphtali, and out of Asher, and out of all Manasseh, and pursued after the Midianites. And Gideon sent messengers throughout all Mount Ephraim, saying, Come down against the Midianites, and take [seize] before them the waters unto Beth-barah and [the] Jordan. Then all the men of Ephraim gathered themselves together, and took [seized] the waters unto Beth-barah and [the] Jordan. And they took two princes of the Midianites, Oreb and Zeeb [Raven and Wolf]; and they slew Oreb upon [at] the rock Oreb [Raven's Rock], and Zeeb they slew at the wine-press of Zeeb [Wolf's Press], and pursued Midian, and brought the heads of Oreb and Zeeb to Gideon on [from] the other side [of the] Jordan.

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Ver. 12. And Midian and Amalek. The pregnant and musing character of the style of our Book, notwithstanding its entire simplicity and artlessness, shows itself especially in the episode concerning Gideon. In order to emphasize the contrast which they present to the scanty means of Israel — the handful of men who followed Gideon — the countless numbers and vast resources of the enemy are once more pointed out. On one side, there are three hundred men, on foot; on the other, a multitude numerous as an army of locusts, riders on camels countless as the sands of the sea-shore (cf. above, on ch. vi. 5). This contrast must needs be insisted on here, that so the wonderful help of God may stand out in bold relief; that Israel may learn that victory comes not of numbers, but is the gift of God, and that in all their conflicts, it is the spirit of God who endows their enemies with victorious courage, that He may chasten his people, or fill them with fear and confusion, notwithstanding their multitude and might, that Israel may be delivered. God governs man's free will. He turns the hearts of men according to his wisdom. He raises the courage of the few and small to victory, and brings the proud and great to grief. It is his work that Gideon with three hundred men dares attack the enormous multitude; his doing that, as the soldier's dream and its interpretation indicate, sad forebodings fill the heart of the proud and mighty foe, and cause it to faint before the coming conflict.

Ver. 13. And as Gideon came, behold, a man told a dream. From the enemy's dream, Gideon will learn the frame of mind in which they are. For this end he was to go into the encampment, thereby to perfect his own confidence. Jehovah is God of the heathen also. Although they do not believe in Him, they are yet instruments in his hand. It was He who, without their knowing it, raised them up and directed their way. They did not learn to know Him from his works; and yet He shone above them, like the sun concealed by clouds and vapors. The manifest God they fail to see by day; but the Hidden and Unknown they seek in dreams. All heathenism is, to a certain extent, a great dream; and it is in accordance with its nature, that as all nations dream, so all are disposed to find in dreams the indications of a hidden truth. Their interpreters did not know the God of Truth in himself; but He who turns the nations as water-courses, fills their hearts, when He pleases, with visions and interpretations which have their rise in truth. Hence, when in Scripture, God frequently favors heathen with dreams of truth, He does not thereby sanctify every dream; but only uses dreams to influence the men whom He takes under the guidance of his wisdom, — the Philistine king, for instance, Laban the Aramæan, the Egyptian baker and butler, — because they already look on dreams as such as hiding a divine mystery. Dreams appeared the more significant, when great events were manifestly at hand. And in the condition of mental excitement which under such circumstances seizes on men, they are natural and to be expected. Thus elsewhere also we hear of dreams by generals before battle. Leonidas, Plutarch (on Herodotus) tells us, had a dream before the battle of Thermopylæ, which disclosed to him the future destinies of Greece and Thebes. Xerxes had a dream previous to his Greek campaign; and Gustavus Adolphus is said to have dreamed before the battle of Leipzig, that he was wrestling with Tilly (Joh. Scheffer, Memorab. Suet. Gentis, p. 23). It was not unknown to the Midianites that Gideon, though but a contemned foe, lay encamped on the mountain. The peculiar dream must therefore the more impress the soldier who dreamed it.

A round barley-loaf rolled itself. The narrative, notwithstanding its simplicity and brevity, is very vivid and forcible. The animated הָרָלָהּ recurs three times. The dream itself also portrays the contrast with which it has to do, with uncommon clearness. The barley-loaf is the symbol of wretchedness and poverty,<sup>1</sup> over against the luxury and wealth of Midian. Indigent Bedouins, who have nothing else, at this day still subsist on barley-bread, which they sometimes dip in goat's fat (Ritter, xiv. 1003).<sup>2</sup> The cake or loaf is here called חֶלֶל, a term variously explained. The definition of Gesenius, who derives it from חָלַל = חָלַל, to roll, seems to be the most likely. The mention of the round form of the loaf was necessary to bring its rolling vividly before the imagination, since all loaves were not round. The Arabs of the desert, according to Niebuhr, take a round lump of dough, and bury it in hot coals, until they think it baked. Then they knock off the ashes, and eat it (Beschreib. Arab. p. 52). Such a wretched loaf is that which the Midianite sees rolling in his dream. It signifies Gideon and Israel, who, by reason of their enemies, were reduced to poverty and distress (ch. vi. 4). It comes rolling "against" the encampment (בְּפָנֵיהֶם), not "in" it, as the expositors have it; for the dream depicts the coming event.

And it came to the tent, וְהָאֵתָלָהּ. The tent — with the article. It would be an error to think here, with Bertheau, who follows Josephus, of the tent of the king; for there were several kings. The tent of the dream stands collectively for all the tents of the encampment; for the very idea of the dream is that the rolling loaf comes into collision with the tents in general. One tent after another is struck by it, falls, and is turned upside down. וְהָאֵתָלָהּ, and "the tent," all the tents, one after another, lay overturned. By this venaphal, the narrator recapitulates, as it were, the falling of the several tents, which in the vivid dream vision, in which all notions of time and space are forgotten, appeared like the downfall of a single tent.<sup>3</sup>

Ver. 14. And his fellow answered. The fact that a true interpretation is given by one comrade to the other, must be specially noted. The first has not asked, but only related; the other is no sooth-sayer, but only a companion. So much the more significant is the frame of mind in which the interpretation originates. For there exists no visible ground for thinking it possible that, notwithstanding their great power, Midian may be delivered into the hands of a man like Gideon. But of the Midianites, being nomads; their tent was their all in all. Their wives, their children, their cattle, their goods, their vesture, their treasure, were all collected in it and about it." — Tr.]

what does exist, is an evil conscience. Through seven years Midian had plundered and trodden Israel. This is the first time, in all these years, that resistance is attempted. That in spite of distress and numerical weakness, Israel ventures now to begin a war, must of itself excite attention and make an impression. How long had it been, since Israel had unfurled the banners of its God! Proud tyranny is already startled at the prospect of resistance from a few faithful ones.<sup>1</sup> According to Herodotus (vii. 16), Artaban says to Xerxes: "Men are wont to be visited in sleep by images of what they have thought on during the day." The principle applies in this case to both dreamer and interpreter. Dream and interpretation both reflect the forebodings of an evil conscience, which God is about to judge. The interpreter compares the rolling loaf with the sword of Gideon. (The hithpael of יָדָה, here applied to that which symbolized the sword of Gideon (ver. 13), is also used by the sacred writer of the sword which kept the entrance to the garden of Eden. (Gen. iii. 24.) He it is — continues the interpreter — who rises up against the domination of Midian: does he venture on this, and darest thou thus, — be sure that his God (hence the article with Elohim, since without the article it also designates their gods) has delivered Midian into his power.

Ver. 15. When Gideon heard this. What Gideon hears is not merely the interpretation of a dream which confirms his brightest hopes. The dream is one which his enemies have, and the interpretation is their own. He hears in it an expression of the tone and mood of their minds. He learns that the confidence of the enemy is already broken by the reflection that Israel's Lord is once more in the field. Astonished and adoring, he and his attendant hear this wonder, as great and real as any other that God has shown him. They feel that God has done this — they see that He is leader and victor — with thanksgiving they bow before Him.<sup>2</sup>

Vers. 16–18. And he divided the three hundred men. Encouraged, Gideon hastens to act. He divides his band into three companies, so as to be able to surround the hostile encampment (cf. ver. 21). He bids the two companies who are to take their stations on the other sides, to attend to his signal, and gives them the battle-cry. Now, as to this cry, though ver. 18 gives it, "Of Jehovah and of Gideon," yet, since ver. 20 has, "Sword of Jehovah and of Gideon," it is evident that in the former verse the word "sword" is to be supplied. For the two companies who were to wait for the trumpet-blast of Gideon and those with him, could not understand the words of the distant cry, and yet they also shouted, "Sword of Jehovah and of Gideon" (ver. 20). Moreover, the command must have been executed as it was given; and hence the fact that according to ver. 20 Gideon's own company joined in the longer form, proves that to have been originally given. The cry itself is very expressive. It tells the Midianites that the sword of the God whose people and faith they have oppressed, and of the man whose insignificance they have despised, whose family they have injured, and who through God becomes their conqueror, is about to be swung over their heads.

Vers. 19–21. And Gideon came to the border line of the camp about the beginning of the middle watch. From the mention of the middle watch, it has been justly inferred that the night must be considered as divided into three watches. It was still deep in the night when Gideon undertook the surprise. The middle watch was just begun; the sentinels, it is added, with good reason, had just (יָדָה) been set — for as the middle watch advanced, the army would begin to stir. Prodigious was the alarm that seized on Midian, when suddenly the trumpets clanged, the pitchers crashed, the thundering battle-cry broke out, the torches<sup>3</sup> blazed. . . . Accounts are not wanting in the history of other nations, of similar stratagems adopted by bold generals. Tacitus expresses himself on this subject after his own manner (Annal. i. 68, 4): "The clangor of trumpets and the glitter of arms (sonus tubarum, fulgor armorum) easily become destructive to a foe who thinks only of a few, half-armed opponents; the more unexpected the alarm, the greater the loss (cadebant ut rebus secundis avidi, ita adversis incauti)."<sup>4</sup> So the Roman Minucius Rufus terrified the Scordisci, by causing trumpets to be blown from among the mountains round about, the sound of which, echoed by the rocks, spread fear and terror (Frontinus, Strategematicon, ii. 3). The ancients named such surprises Panic terrors, because Pan put the enemies of Dionysus to flight with his horns<sup>4</sup> (cf. Polyænus, Strategem. i. and ii.).

The terror which seized on Midian was in truth a terror from God. This the simple narrative sets forth most classically. Ver. 16 had already stated that all had trumpets in their hands, and pitchers, with torches, whereby no hand was left free to use the sword. Ver. 20 says, still more explicitly, "they had the torches in their left, and the trumpets in their right hands." They did not use the sword, but only cried, "Sword of Jehovah and of Gideon." (Not, however, as if Gideon were put on a parallel with God: יְהוָה וְגִדְדֵּן is to be

<sup>1</sup> Æschylus (Persæ, 188, etc.) represents poetically the forebodings and dreams of Atossa concerning the impending disaster of Xerxes; but the moral view, that such dreams were inspired by the evil conscience of the conquering tyrant, and that the insignificant people triumphed through God, is wanting.

<sup>2</sup> [Our author treats יְהוָה וְגִדְדֵּן as a plural, and translates: "they worshipped." The form is undoubtedly singular, cf. Gen. xxiii. 7; xiv. 52; etc., and is so regarded by most grammarians, Ges. Gram. 75 Rem. 18; Green, 176, 1. First, however, both in his Lexicon and in his Hebrew Concordance treats it as plural. In his Lexicon, s. v.

יְהוָה וְגִדְדֵּן, he says: "יְהוָה וְגִדְדֵּן; plural, sometimes יְהוָה וְגִדְדֵּן, in pause יְהוָה וְגִדְדֵּן, sometimes יְהוָה וְגִדְדֵּן." — Ta.]

or earthen vessel at night." But the לְפָדִים of this history can scarcely be "oil lamps," for which כִּרְוֹת would be more appropriate. A better explanation is suggested by the following note in Smith's Bible Diet. (Art. Gideon): "It is curious to find 'lamps and pitchers' in use for a similar purpose at this very day in the streets of Cairo. The Zabti or Agha of the police carries with him at night, 'a torch which burns, soon after it is lighted, without a flame, excepting when it is waved through the air, when it suddenly blazes forth; it therefore answers the same purpose as our dark lantern. The burning end is sometimes concealed in a small pot or jar, or covered with something else, when not required to give light (Lane, Mod. Egypt., i. ch. iv.)." — Ta.]

taken as supplementing the preceding words — “even that committed to Gideon;” for Gideon was the visible bearer of God’s sword.) Hence, also, ver. 21 says: “They stood (the troops of Gideon) round about the encampment;” i. e., they stand, not otherwise attacking, but simply blowing their trumpets; yet the enemy takes to “running” (רָצוּ) stands contrasted with וַיִּנְקְדוּ. Just as in Joshua’s time the walls of Jericho fell, while the trumpets of Israel sounded, so here it is — “These blew, those fled.” Terror and disorder ruled the hour in the Midianitish camp. In the darkness and confusion, they no longer knew what they did. Hence, ver. 22 states that “while the three hundred blew the trumpets” — this is intentionally repeated, and shows that they scarcely needed a sword against Midian — the Midianites thought themselves attacked by enemies, and raged among themselves, for “Jehovah had set every man’s sword against his fellow, and against the whole camp,” or as we say, in cases of great confusion, “All against one, one against all.”

Ver. 22. And the host fled to Beth-shittah (the House of Acacias), towards Zererah, to the edge of Abel-meholah, near Tabbath. The direction of the flight, and the situation of the places named, can only be inferred from the connection and from a comparison of other passages. The mention of the places must have had a local significance for the reader who was acquainted with their situation. From ch. viii. we learn that the Midianites did not flee in one body, but in several divisions. This is as might be expected, seeing the army was composed of different tribes — Midianites, Amalekites, and “Sons of the East.” This separation in flight is also indicated by the statement of the places to which they fled. First, they are said to have fled “to Beth-shittah, towards Zererah,” by which one line of flight is given. When it is further said that they fled “to the edge of Abel-meholah, near Tabbath,” the intention cannot be to prolong the first line, which is already terminated by the phrase “towards Zererah,” but a second is indicated. This also explains the measures adopted by Gideon. Being unable to follow both himself, he calls on Ephraim to cut off the other line of flight. The enemy’s effort was to gain the fords of the Jordan. That one through which kings Zebah and Zalmunna must have passed (ch. viii. 5), seeing they had the start of the others, is evidently indicated by צִרְרָה, “towards Zererah.” Many codices have צִרְרָה, “toward Zeredah,” daleth being substituted for resh. Kimchi, however, expressly calls attention to the two ra’s. But even in the earliest times Zeredah was read instead of Zererah, as appears from 2 Chron. iv. 17, where we find צִרְרָה. From the same passage compared with 1 Kgs. vii. 46, it is evident that Zeredah was identified with צִרְרָה, Zorthan. From both it appears to have been situated in the vicinity of the Jordan, not very far from Beth-shean (Beisan); and from Josh. iii. 15, 16, it may be inferred that near it there was a ford through the river. This explains why Midian took this line. They approached the river from the direction of Beth-shittah. Berthean did well to connect this place with the modern village Shutta, mentioned by Robinson (ii. 356), and situated in the vicinity of Beth-shean. Keil’s objection that it lies north of Gilboa, is of no force under our view of the localities as above indicated.

Zorthan (Zarthan) is mentioned in connection with a Succoth on this side the Jordan (1 Kgs. vii. 46). To this day the Jordan is passed near some ruins, not far from Beisan, which are supposed to indicate the site of Succoth (Ritter, xv. 446). The other line of fugitives took a more southerly direction, “towards the edge of Abel-meholah.” The name of this place, celebrated as the birth-place of the prophet Elisha, has been preserved in the Onomasticon of Eusebius as Αβελμαολαι (ed. Parthey, p. 8). The fact that a שִׁתָּה, edge, or strand, is spoken of, indicates perhaps the presence of a wady. And in fact, coming down from Beisan or Zertn, the first western tributary of the Jordan met with, is a Wady el-Maleh (cf. Ritter, xvii. 432-448, in several passages). The fugitives are further said to have come to the edge of Abel-meholah “near Tabbath.” There is still a city Tubās, not far from Wady Maleh, usually considered to be the Thebez of the history of Abimelech (ch. ix. 50), for which, however, there is no compulsory ground.

Vers. 23-25. Gideon had a definite plan of pursuit. To carry it out, he required more men than the three hundred who had stood with him in the victory. The troops whom he had collected from Manasseh, Asher, Zebulun, and Naphtali (ch. vi. 35), though subsequently dismissed, had not yet disbanded. They now returned (Zebulun only is not named), and assisted in the pursuit. But to overtake the Midianites on their fleet camels was not an easy matter. If not intercepted, those of them who were hastening southward, would get as safely over the Jordan as kings Zebah and Zalmunna had done near Beisan (at Zorthan). Gideon had foreseen this, and had early sent a message to Ephraim, over whose territory the fugitive host was passing, to “seize the waters as far as Beth-barah and the Jordan.” Ephraim acted promptly, and a part of the Midianites were cut off. The “waters” can only mean some western tributaries of the Jordan; for Gideon’s object is to prevent that body of the enemy which by his pursuit he has thus far kept away from the river, from gaining the lower fords and crossing over. He therefore desires “the waters” to be seized “to Beth-barah.” This name Beth-barah cannot well have originated from Beth-abarah (Ford-house). It does not appear that the letter l has been dropped out of בֵּית־עַבְרָה. Besides, if Beth-barah meant “Ford-house,” the direction “to Beth-barah” would have been superfluous; for in that case the seizure of the Jordan would have included that of the “waters” and the ford. On the other hand, it was important to provide for the occupation of the “waters,” or the particular stream intended, along its whole length to its source; lest, while it was guarded below, the enemy should cross it above. Beth-barah is therefore, with Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast., p. 104), to be explained as “House of the Spring,” “Well-house” (from בֵּית or בַּר), by which the narrative becomes clear and intelligible. Therewith, also fall all attempts to identify this Beth-barah with the Beth-abarah of Origen’s reading at John i. 28; for that lay beyond the Jordan. Origen was, however, led by a right critical feeling. Instead of a Bethany, the people of his day doubtless spoke of a Beth-abarah in that region; and this, philologically and in fact, was one and the same with Bethany. For this trans-Jordanic Bethany — not to be confounded with that near Jerusalem — is to be derived from Beth-ain, as Beth-abarah from Beth-beer, and like the latter signifies "House of the Spring," — a point to which I formerly directed attention in my "Bericht über Renan (Berlin, 1864).

The Ephraimites, to their great glory, captured the two Midianite princes Oreb and Zeeb. It was the reward of their prompt obedience. Very suggestive are the names, under which these two princes of the desert had perhaps been especially dreaded — "Wolf" and "Raven." Among other nations also, these animals, frequenters of desolate places, and eager attendants on battle-fields, have furnished surnames for noted warriors. The Arabs, because the raven follows in the wake of caravans, call him Eoul-Mirkal, Father of the Swift Camel, or Ion-Bersun, Son of the Sumpter-horse. Noteworthy, at all events, is the conjunction of "Raven and Wolf." Coupled in the same way, we find them sacred to the Scandinavian Odin. Both ravens and wolves were also consecrated to Apollo. In the early Roman legends the woodpecker (picus) takes the place of the raven as companion of the wolf, and both belong to the God of War (cf. my Schamir, Erf. 1856, p. 103). The Arabs give to both the bird and the quadruped the common name Ibnol-Erdh, Son of the Earth (Hammer, Namen der Araber, p. 48).

The fame of the deed perpetuated itself in local designations, and the Raven's Rock and Wolf's Wine-press commemorate the disgrace of Midian. The Odyssey likewise speaks of a Raven's rock in Ithaca (xiii. 408), which name the scholiast derives from a fallen hunter (cf. Bochart, Hierozoicon, ii. 203); and the use of the German Rabenstein,<sup>1</sup> is undeniably analogous. In the other name, the term jekob (יֶכֶב), wine-press is borrowed from the hollow form of the object; hence, the name is here equivalent to Wolf's-hole. Similar historical allusions are supposed by the German Muse to lie concealed in Worms (from Wurme, slain by Siegfried) and in Drachenfels (cf. Grimm, D. Heldens., pp. 155, 316).

In Haurân, Wetzstein heard the name el-Gurâb, the Raven, applied to a spent volcano (p. 16); and Castle Kerek, at the south end of the Dead Sea, was called Hisnal-gorab, Raven's-castle (Ritter, xiv. 1042).

The important remark in ver. 25, that the heads of the two princes were brought to Gideon "from beyond the Jordan," induces the hope that the name and location of the "Raven's-rock" may yet be traced. The "waters" which Ephraim occupied, must have been those now known as Wady el-Faria. Below this wady, there is to this day a much used ford (Ritter, xv. 449); while over against it, on the eastern bank of the Jordan, there is the steep height of Jebel Ajlûn, overlooking the Ghor, and commanding the confluent valleys (Ritter, xv. 369). On this height there are the ruins of a castle, of which Ibrahim Pasha still availed himself to hold the robber hordes in check, and which (according to the reports of various travellers on this yet but imperfectly known locality) bore the name of Kalaat-er Rabbad, or Rabua. The Ephraimites, charged with the occupation of the Jordan, had crossed over and seized on this important point in order fully to command the Jordan valley. Here they captured the princes "Raven and Wolf." The "Raven's-rock" was still known by this name in the time of Isaiah (see ch. x. 26); and in the corrupted designation Rabua, a similarity of sound with Oreb or Gorab may be traced. The exploit was swift and fortunate. Gideon in his pursuit was still on this side of the Jordan; while he was making a halt before crossing over, the Ephraimites were already returning in triumph from the opposite shore, bringing with them the heads of the slain princes. All other explanations, as found among others in Bertheau and Keil also, fail to harmonize satisfactorily with the connection. The narrator designedly adds the words "from beyond Jordan," that the reader may know that Ephraim had gained the great triumph, before Gideon could so much as cross the river. This passing remark helps to prepare the reader for the opening narrative of ch. viii. It foreshadows the pride and selfishness of Ephraim. Finally, that Ephraim was beyond the Jordan, and there captured the hostile chieftains, is evident even from the words (ver. 25), "they pursued Midian;" for as they held the Jordan and "the waters," they could only pursue those who had passed the river.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

After his first victory over idolatry in his father's house, Gideon has courage for the second, over enemies in the field. He seeks the few, not the many. He knows that help comes from God, not from the multitude; and because he knows this, he conquers. The countless host of enemies vanishes like dust — not because of his three hundred: the terrors of God dissolve them, and turn them against each other. Doubtless, Gideon was also a hero of the sword; but first God's deed — then man's. Therefore he succeeds in everything, from first to last. Gideon is not envious of God, as Ephraim is of him. To God belongs the glory, first and last.

[B. HALL: Now, when we would look that Gideon should give charge of whetting their swords, and sharpening their spears, and fitting their armor, he only gives order for empty pitchers, and lights, and trumpets. The cracking of these pitchers shall break in pieces this Midianitish clay; the kindling of these lights shall extinguish the light of Midian; these trumpets sound no other than a soul-peal to all the host of Midian: there shall need nothing but noise and light to confound this innumerable army. And if the pitchers, and brands, and trumpets of Gideon, did so daunt and dismay the proud troops of Midian and Amalek, who can we think shall be able to stand before the last terror, wherein the trumpet of the archangel shall sound, and the heavens shall pass away with a noise, and the elements shall be on a flame about our ears? — THE SAME: Those two and twenty thousand Israelites that slipped away for fear, when the fearful Midianites fled, can pursue and kill them, and can follow them at the heels, whom they durst not look at in the face. Our fight gives advantage to the feeblest adversary, whereas our resistance foilth the greatest. — SCOTT: In this world, the wicked are often left under the power of their own delusions and the fury of their mad passions, to avenge the cause of God on each other: a period is approaching, when we may expect that the persecuting foes of Christianity will destroy one another, whilst the host of Israel shall look on, and have nothing to do but to blow the trumpet of the gospel. — WORDSWORTH: Gideon has only three hundred men, and Christ's church is called "a little flock," and their foes are innumerable; but their countless myriads melt away, dispersed by the breath of God.—THE SAME: The princes of Midian represent the spiritual enemies of the Church. Is it by chance that they were called Oreb, the Raven, and Zeeb, the Wolf? The Raven is contrasted with the Dove in the history of the Flood (see Gen. viii. 7) as an unclean bird (cf. Lev. xi. 15); and in the N. T. the Wolf is the emblem of those false teachers who tear and devour the flock of Christ.—THEODORET (as quoted by Wordsworth): Gideon overcame Midian with unarmed soldiers, bearing only trumpets, torches, and pitchers. So Christ overcame the world by unarmed apostles, bearing the trumpet of preaching and the torch of miracles.—Tr.]

CHAPTER VIII. 1-3.

- 1 And the men of Ephraim said unto him, Why hast thou served us thus, that thou calledst us not when [didst not call out<sup>1</sup> to us that] thou wentest [wast going] to fight with [against] the Midianites? and they did chide [quarrel] with him sharply
2 [vehemently]. And he said unto them, What have I done now in comparison of you? Is not the gleanings of the grapes [omit: of the grapes] of Ephraim better
3 than the vintage of Abi-ezer? God hath delivered into your hands<sup>2</sup> the princes of Midian, Oreb and Zeeb: and what was I able to do in comparison of you? Then their anger [excitement]<sup>3</sup> was [omit: was] abated toward [against] him, when he had [omit: had] said that.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

1 Ver. 1. — לֹבְלֵתִי הָרָאוּת לִבִּי פִי חֲלָקָה. It is not necessary to take פִּי in a temporal sense, which at all events it has very seldom. The הָרָאוּת is followed by the objective clause of that which the persons addressed are notified of.

[2 Ver. 2. — "Into your hands," with emphasis. Hence the Hebrew puts it first: "Into your hands (lit. hand) God gave the princes of Midian," etc.—Tr.]

3 Ver. 3. — רָפוּתָהּ רָפוּתָהּ, like חֲרָףָהּ חֲרָףָהּ, Ps. xxxvii. 8. רָפוּתָהּ denotes violent, panting excitement.

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

In his dealing with puffed-up Ephraim, even more than by his victories, Gideon approves himself as a true warrior of God, wiser in his humility than his dazzled countrymen in their pride. The service rendered by Ephraim in slaying Oreb and Zeeb, was after all of but secondary merit. They had only smitten an already shattered and terrified enemy: had only captured the game which another had chased into their hands. Where was Ephraim when Midian in full force encamped himself in the country? But inferior merit is the more arrogant. The tribe is so intoxicated by the easy victory over the two princes, that it presumes to reprimand Gideon for beginning a war without them, and thus undertaking to deprive them of the laurels which they would certainly have won. So little does Ephraim understand the true strength with which Israel has conquered, that he accounts it an insult to himself on the part of the smaller tribe to have conquered without him. The pride of the mighty men of the world could not be more clearly depicted. They contend with him vehemently (בְּרִיבָהּ), just as the men of Nineveh, repenting, "cry vehemently" (בְּרִיבָהּ, Jon. iii. 8) unto God. They address the great hero fiercely and vociferously. His answer is admirable. He might have humbled them by a few words about his deed; but he will have no strife where Israel needs unity. He says nothing of his own great victory. He does not irritate them by referring to their previous inactivity, although their tribe was so great; or by reminding them that after all he had sent them the word which enabled them to capture an enemy whom he was pursuing. On the contrary, he quiets them by extolling their great merits. He may not conceal that the victory was gained without them; but, his vintage, is it not less than their gleanings? What comparison is there between his spoils and theirs? He, still on this side the Jordan; they, already adorned with the trophies of the "Raven and Wolf!" He lets them know, however, who it is that really gives victory, namely Elohim. But here also the nice discrimination shows itself, with which the terms Jehovah, ha-Elohim, and Elohim alternate, according to the spiritual position of the persons addressed or spoken of. To Ephraim, Gideon says that Elohim gave them victory — as he sometimes gives it even to heathen. He uses this term because they lacked humility and faith to know that Jehovah, ha-Elohim, the true God of Israel, gives strength to his people, and that, thus endowed, it is of no consequence whether the militant tribe be great or small (cf. ver. 6, etc.).

What have I done now in comparison with you? The vain tribe, which only smarted at the thought that an insignificant member of Manasseh should reap greater glory than Ephraim, is quieted when this person himself disclaims the glory. Vanity that prides itself on seeming merits, is always contracted. The Ephraimites do not understand the modesty of Gideon, which, in denying, as it were, his own real merits, necessarily pours the contempt of irony on their pretended deserts. But Gideon's object is gained. They allow themselves to be pacified, and go home to bask themselves in the sunshine of their achievements. Gideon, for his part, teaches that victory alone does not suffice to save a people; but that he is the real hero who is truly humble, and for the sake of peace overcomes himself. To conquer, he must know how to bend.

The narrative stands here in its proper place. It does not presuppose anything that happened later; but connects, historically and morally, what goes before and what follows after. Gideon is still in the midst of his campaign, when Ephraim attacks him with its pride. But his subsequent career of victory, speaks louder than envy. The statement of Josephus (Ant. v. 6, 6), that Ephraim was afterwards punished for its pride, rests on no Scriptural authority; but the confusion to which they are put by the subsequent deeds of Gideon, to whom after all they were indebted for their own achievement also, is a discipline of the sharpest kind.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ephraim is jealous of Gideon. Jealousy is a quality which only seeks its own. It is a characteristic of unbelief, which envies God his power and love.

STARKE: He acts wisely, who prefers to forego somewhat of his own rights, rather than by a contrary course to invite the opposition of others, and so debar himself from attaining a greater good. —

GERLACH: Gideon's answer, as modest as it was prudent, quiets the Ephraimites. He appears here, as afterwards, as a high-minded man, free from low ambition and domineering tendencies.

[BF. HALL: I did not hear the Ephraimites offering themselves into the front of the army before the fight, and now they are ready to fight with Gideon because they were not called to fight with Midian: I hear them expostulating after it. After the exploit done, cowards are valiant. Their quarrel was, that they were not called. It had been a greater praise of their valor to have gone unbidden. . . . None speak so big in the end of the fray as the feeblest. — THE SAME: Ephraim flies upon Gideon, whilst the Midianites fly from him; when Gideon should be pursuing his enemies, he is pursued by brethren, and now is glad to spend that wind in pacifying of his own, which should have been bestowed in the slaughter of a common adversary. It is a wonder if Satan suffer us to be quiet at home, whilst we are exercised with wars abroad. Had not Gideon learned to speak fair, as well as to smite, he had found work enough from the swords of Joseph's sons; his good words are as victorious as his sword; his pacification of friends, better than his execution of enemies. — SCOTT: In those things which pertain to the truth, authority, and glory of God, Christians should be unmoved as the sturdy oak; but in the little concerns of their own interest or reputation, they should resemble the pliant willow, that yields to every gust. — HENRY: Very great and good men must expect to have their patience tried, by the unkindnesses and follies even of those they serve, and must not think it strange. — BUSH: The incidents mentioned afford a striking illustration of two emphatic declarations of Scripture: 1. That "only by pride cometh contention;" and, 2. That "for every right work a man is envied of his neighbor." — TR.]

And Gideon went up by the way of them that dwelt [dwell] in tents on the east of Nobah and Jogbehah, and smote the host: 12 for [while] the host was [thought itself] secure. And when [omit: when] Zebah and Zalmunna fled, [and] he pursued after them, and took the two kings of Midian, 13 Zebah and Zalmunna, and discomfited [terrified] all the host. And Gideon the son of Joash returned from [the] battle [war] before the sun was up [from the Ascent of the Sun].<sup>3</sup> And [he] caught a young man [a boy] of the men of Succoth, and inquired of him: and he described unto [wrote down for] him the princes of Succoth, and the elders thereof, even threescore and seventeen men. And he came unto the men of Succoth, and said, Behold Zebah and Zalmunna, with [as to] whom ye did upbraid [mock] me, saying, Are the hands of Zebah and Zalmunna now [already] in thine hand, that we should give bread unto thy men that are weary [hungry]? And he took the elders of the city, and thorns of the wilderness, 17 and briars, and with them he taught [gave a lesson to] the men of Succoth. And he beat [tore] down the tower of Penuel, and slew the men of the city. Then said he [And he said] unto Zebah and Zalmunna, What manner of men were they whom ye slew at Tabor? And they answered, As thou art, so were they; each one 19 resembled [looked like] the children [sons] of a king. And he said, They were my brethren, even the sons of my mother: as the Lord [Jehovah] liveth, if ye had 20 saved them alive, I would not slay you. And he said unto Jether his first-born, Up, and slay them. But the youth [boy] drew not his sword: for he feared, 21 because [for] he was yet a youth [boy]. Then Zebah and Zalmunna said, Rise thou, and fall upon [strike] us: for as the man is, so is his strength. And Gideon arose, and slew Zebah and Zalmunna, and took away the ornaments [moons] that were on their camels' necks.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 6. — Dr. Cassel: "Hast thou the fist of Zebah and Zalmunna already in thy hand," etc. Bertheau and Keil, in their commentaries, have the same rendering, merely changing Luther's plural, Sind die Fäuste, to the singular.

פֶּסֶת is properly the hollow hand, the palm; accordingly the Dutch Version renders, rather awkwardly to be sure, "Is dan the handpalm van Zebah en Zalmunna alreeds in uwe hand," etc. The word "fist," even if it did not somewhat alter the metaphor involved, lacks dignity in modern English, although it avoids the tameness of using "hand" twice. For an independent version, De Wette's would be better: "Hast thou then Zebah and Zalmunna already in thy hand," etc. — Tr.]

[2 Ver. 10. — מַחֲנִיחֵם: singular, with plural suffix. Cf. Ges. Gram. Sect. 98, 9. — Tr.]

[3 Ver. 12. — מִלְּמַעְלָה הַחֵרֶם. The above rendering takes no account of the ל. "At" would be better than "from." It is literally, "from at" the ascent of the sun. It indicates the point to which Gideon came, and at which he turned back. — Tr.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Ver. 4-9. And Gideon came to the Jordan. The pride of Ephraim was not the only incident by which Gideon was taught that the liberation of his people required more than victory over its enemies: that its servitude consisted not merely in external subjection, but much more in the internal bondage of sin and unbelief. Gideon also experiences the truth, which the political history of all ages demonstrates, that the friends of the people and its true interests, do not always find their natural supporters in the people itself. Instead of confederates, they find obstructors and opponents. Was not Gideon's a national achievement, for the freedom and happiness of all? Is it not for all that he risks his life? For whom does he wage war even to extermination with Midian, but for all Israel? Was it anything unreasonable, that he asked Succoth, a considerable city, for some bread for the men who, notwithstanding the many hardships endured, had not ceased to follow their enthusiastic leader? — The Septuagint justly puts sempotes, hungry, for עֵלֶיכֶם. The same word (עָלָה) is used by Esau, when he returns from the chase, and sees the dish of lentiles (Gen. xxv. 30). Had the men been wearied, they could not have prosecuted the pursuit. But nutritious food would strengthen them. For that they longed. The term is not specific, like רָעַב, but signifies need of physical nourishment. It includes thirst as well as hunger (cf. Job xxii. 7). — But what did Succoth? Instead of compassion and patriotic sympathy, it consulted its own petty interests. Succoth believed not; nor, consequently, saw God's hand in Gideon's victories. Materialism, which rather than risk a loss, will serve a foreign tyrant, is here depicted to the life. The magistracy of Succoth consider, not the duty to assist, but the danger which may result from such a siding with Gideon as would be implied in rendering him aid. For, not to mention that a quantity of bread costs something — and it is noticeable that while Gideon modestly intercedes for his "followers" (פְּרָטֵי) they talk of his band as a host (צְבָאָה), — there is a chance that Gideon may fail in his expedition.

Zebah and Zalmunna may possibly conquer and take vengeance. So do slaves speculate. Not so thought the German cities in 1813, when, driven by the hand of God, Napoleon fled from Russia; a disposition which, in spite of Davoust and Vandamme, brought victory to those cities. "Hast thou," they ask mockingly, "the fist of the kings already in thy hand?" The full hand, הַיָּד הַמְּלִיכִית, must be seized, in order to apply the fetters to captives.

This is the second time that Gideon encounters such folly among his people. But he instantly perceives that humility and gentleness like those shown towards Ephraim, would here be out of place. Ephraim had at all events done something, and had not refused assistance. Here were cowardice and treason combined. He does not, however, chastise them at once. Therein also he shows a soul penetrated by spiritual strength. He will not manifest personal resentment; he will show them that they have offended against the cause of God. He is sure of victory; but before he punishes them, they shall see that finished, the accomplishment of which they now doubt. When he shall appear before Succoth with Zebah and Zalmunna in fetters, they will no doubt be glad to give him bread; but then he will give them that to which now on his king-chase through the desert they refer him — he will thresh them with "thorns of the desert and with barkanim." Owing to the brevity of the narrative, which only gives the leading speeches, while it omits all transitions, it is not altogether clear why Gideon's threat against the inhabitants of Succoth takes the precise form of "thorns." The ingenious Kimchi thought that it was a play on the name of the city, since שֻׁכּוֹת (by the constant Chaldee substitution of ס for ש, שֻׁכּוֹת, plur. שֻׁכּוֹתִים) means a thorn (Job xl. 31; cf. שֻׁכּוֹת, plural שֻׁכּוֹתִים). He even thinks that the name of the city may perhaps have been derived from this word. But, though such a word-play might not have been altogether at variance with the spirit of antiquity, it can scarcely be supposed to have such controlling influence in our passage.

For then why is not the word שֻׁכּוֹת used by Gideon? But instead of it, other and rather remote terms are chosen. The choice of the punishment denounced seems to have a deeper reason. The magistracy of Succoth refuses bread: is not that of itself a mocking reference to the food which the desert affords? But what does Gideon find there? That which can nourish, not men, but at best only the camel, that marvel of the desert — acacia-thorns, thistles, tarfa-needles, springing up amid sand and rock. Shall he thresh these like grain, in order to bake bread? He requites their mockery, by promising with such thorns to belabor their flesh. Hence, the most probable explanation of בְּרִיחֵי will continue to be that, which, after the constant exegetical tradition of the Jews, makes it thistles or thorns (Raschi explains it by the French ronces, briers), and the same as those already indicated by "thorns of the desert." The idea suggests itself that kotse hamidbar may only precede barkanim by way of explanation; in which case בְּרִיחֵי would have the sense of "namely:" "thorns of the desert, namely barkanim."<sup>1</sup> For that Barka (Barca) designates stony styras, may be considered as made out (see on ch. i. 4). The thorns meant are probably those of the acacia, called talk by the Arabs, which cover the ground to such an extent, that many Arabs are accustomed to carry thorn-extractors about them (cf. Ritter, xiv. 207, 336).

That the threatened chastisement corresponds to the expressions made use of by the ungrateful citizens in reply to Gideon's request, is evident from the fact that, though he receives the same treatment from the inhabitants of Penuel, he does not threaten them with the same punishment. These, who deemed themselves secure in their tower, he promises to tear down that bulwark of their pride. בְּשָׁלוֹם: not exactly, when I return in peace; but, when I return prosperously, with success and victory.

Vers. 10–12. And Zebah and Zalmunna were in Karkor. We are yet to trace the course of Gideon's pursuit. Succoth lay beyond the Jordan, for he came to it after crossing the river (ver. 4; cf. Josh. xiii. 27). It was, moreover, south of the Jabbok (Zerka), for the scene of Jacob's wrestling was north of that stream, he alone having remained behind, while his people had crossed over (Gen. xxxii. 23, 24). The place of the wrestling was afterwards occupied by Penuel. When morning had come, Jacob passed over the stream at Penuel (Gen. xxxii. 31), joined his family, met Esau, and afterwards came to Succoth, which was therefore south of the Jabbok. This position of Succoth agrees with that in which we left Gideon at his meeting with Ephraim. That tribe had guarded the Wady el Faria and the fords in its neighborhood. It was in the vicinity of this Wady that they met with Gideon, prosecuting the pursuit, and brought him the heads of the captured princes. Now, if he passed over at this point, he would land south of the Jabbok, and reach Succoth first. He then crossed the Jabbok, and came to Penuel. The hiding-place of the terrified enemy was no secret to him. There is in Hauran an almost unassailable place of refuge for the robber tribes — the volcanic rock-desert of Sâfa (both in the wider and narrower sense), concerning which some very valuable information is given by Wetzstein. It embraces a fertile district, "a Ruhbeh, Paradise," for some months of the year, which is almost as inaccessible as Paradise. Says Wetzstein (Hauran, p. 15, etc.): "Here is the stronghold of the Gêjât, and Stâye, and all the tribes of the eastern slope of the Hauran mountains." The people of Syria have a proverbial expression which says, "he fled into the Wa'r of the Sâfa," i. e., into an unassailable refuge. The Ruhbeh can only be reached by two roads, from the north and the south. The northern is especially dangerous; even in our own days hostile tribes have made inroads at Rigin el Mara. The Sâfa, and the whole of this terrible, rock-walled asylum, is what we are here to understand by the term קַרְקֹר, Karkor. For this word signifies ruins, destruction: cf. Num. xxiv. 17: "he destroys — הָרַס — all the sons of Sheth." The same verb is used, Is. xxii. 5, of the destruction of walls; and in Talmudic as well as modern Hebrew הָרַס means destruction.<sup>2</sup>

2 Eusebius (Onomast., Parthey, p. 253) does not say that this Karkor and Carcaria near Petra are one and the same place. Nor can they be the same, although the names may be similarly explained.

Such being the situation and topography of the place, the significance of the brief statement that the kings were in Karkor, becomes manifest. It not only explains the sense of security felt by the enemy, but also and especially displays the boldness, endurance, wisdom, and energy, with which Gideon followed them into their hiding-place. We can still trace his route; for it passed to the east of Nobah and Jogbehah. Nobah is the same as Kenath (Num. xxxii. 42), which again is the Kanatha of Roman times, and the Kanvât of the present. He who is north of the Jabbok, and passes east of Kanvât, if he be in search of an enemy retired to his hiding-place, must be bound for the Sâfa. But Jogbehah also can be identified. Since Gideon's way is said to have gone to the east of "Nobah and Jogbehah,"<sup>1</sup> the latter must have lain farther north than the other, and there is thus the more reason for regarding it as the same with Jobbah, the Shôbah of Seetzen, Shuhubah of Buckingham (cf. Ritter, xv. 881), and Shubbah of Wetzstein.

Gideon's attack was so unexpected and sudden, that a renewed attempt at flight fails (ver. 12).

The host, it is said, הִתְחַלְּלָה: terror seized it, so that no resistance was offered, and the army surrendered. The celerity of this victorious career, and its results, finds many parallels in the history of the desert tribes. When Mehemet Ali, in 1815, fought against Asyr in Arabia, he pursued the defeated enemy with such haste, that all his stores of subsistence had to be left behind, and he himself was at last reduced to a diet of dates. But he was rewarded for this by the capture of the chiefs of his adversaries, and many others went over to him (cf. Ritter, xii. 932). But that for which no parallels can be adduced, is Gideon's aim, his cause for war, and the fewness of his enthusiastic warriors compared with the overwhelming numbers arrayed against him to the last. Even if the 120,000, lost by Midian in the course of their defeat, from the Hill of Moreh to Karkor, were a round number, a stream of blood nevertheless marked the track of the smitten tyrants, as it marked that of Napoleon's retreat from Russia. It was probably from prisoners and wounded left behind, at Stations of Death, that Gideon learned the secret way into the rocky asylum, called "hell" by Arabic poets, on account of its volcanic formations, and now become a place of judgment for a seven years' oppression (ch. vi. 1; compare the period of 1806-1813 in German history).

Vers. 13-17. And Gideon, the son of Joash, returned from the war from the Ascent of the Sun. The addition Son of Joash, is here put to Gideon's name for the first time since his rising against idolatry. The glory of having finished the conflict, accrues to the family and name of Joash, because in the hour of danger he had sided with his son. For that the conflict is ended, was already indicated by ver. 10, which said that "all that were left" of the "whole host" were in Karkor. The victory over this remnant ended, not merely a battle, but הַמִּלְחָמָה, the war. The hero can now turn back, but not yet to his own house. He must first settle accounts with Succoth and Penueh. He comes to Succoth first. Had he returned the way he went, he must have reached Penueh first.

His design was evidently to surprise both places, but chiefly Succoth, so that when he came to punish, the scourge might fall only on the persons who had deserved it. Bearing this in mind, the connection makes it clear that מַלְמַחֲלָה הַחֹרֶם is not to be taken as a note of time,<sup>3</sup> sunrise, but of locality. It is designed to explain how Gideon comes to reach Succoth first, and from a direction from which the inhabitants did not expect him. Gideon everywhere displays that great quality of a general, the skill to baffle the calculations of his adversary. What sort of a locality "Maaleh Hacheres" was, the following hypothesis may perhaps indicate with some degree of probability. Succoth lay in the valley of the Jordan, the Ghor, קְצִיָּה

(Josh. xiii. 27). The expression מַלְמַחֲלָה can only be used in connection with mountains (cf. "Maaleh Akkrabbim," ch. i. 36). The heights from which Gideon descended in order to reach Succoth, were the mountains east of the Jordan, which unfortunately are yet too little known. About the names, also, which in earlier and later periods they bore, we are very much in the dark. Now, in the territory of Reuben, we find (Josh. xiii. 19) a "Tsereth Hashachar on the Mountain of the Valley." The name חֹרֶם signifies the sun. "Sunrise" (מִזְרֵחַ) always indicates the east side. Accordingly, in the passage just cited, we have a Tsereth Hashachar, i. e., "Splendor of the Dawn," on the mountains of the Ghor, in the east. It may therefore be assumed with great probability that the name "Ascent of the Sun" also was borne by the heights of the mountains east of the Jordan, whether those mountains were named "Sun" or "Sunrise" on local, or what is more probable on religious grounds.

As Gideon appeared quite unexpectedly, he succeeded in laying hold, unnoticed, of a boy, who wrote down for him the names of those who composed the magistracy of the city. It is not without interest to observe that the boy (נֶעֱר) could write, that he knew the names of the authorities, and that these numbered seven and seventy, of whom seven or five may be regarded as שְׁבִיעִים, princes, and seventy or seventy-two as elders. If the government of the city was in the hands of certain families, the boy would not find it difficult to give their names. The astonishment and terror of the inhabitants were doubtless great. The more haughty they had formerly been, the more terrified were they now. It is to be carefully noted that Gideon's purpose is to punish only the rulers of Succoth, and that after he has done it, the remark is made: וַיִּנְדֹּשׁ אֶת אֲנָשֵׁי סֻכּוֹת — "he taught the men of Succoth a lesson." This alone shows that the reading וַיִּנְדֹּשׁ, "he threshed," already proposed by Serarius, and again by Bertheau, is not to be approved. For the fact that "he took the elders of the city and the thorns," makes it clear that he cannot have chastised the people of Succoth. But he "made them — the whole people, — to know;" gave them a lesson which showed how badly their rulers had acted, and what penalties such distrust and selfishness entail (which has been well apprehended by the Jewish expositors). At Penuel, however, which, having heard of the visitation of Succoth, had the folly to defend itself, the traitors lost their lives. It is truly admirable, how finely the narrative, with all its plainness, brings out the specially decisive points of view. Gideon went first to Succoth, because he did not wish to punish all the inhabitants, and it became necessary therefore to surprise the city, lest the guilty should escape, and to "catch a boy," who unreservedly gives him their names. His purpose as to Penuel requires no surprise—the tower cannot run away; and it is the folly of the inhabitants, that in defending it, they lose their lives as well as their tower.

Vers. 18-21. And he said to Zebah and Zalmunna. This took place on his arrival at home, i. e. in Israel, for his son Jether was present, who, being but a boy, cannot have shared in the heroic expedition. The place cannot, however, be definitely determined; perhaps it was his old battlefield, the plain of Jezreel, where the people came flocking together, in order to behold the terrible kings in fetters.

The closing scene of Gideon's dealings with these robber-kings, like every other in his history, is worthy of a hero who has been raised up to battle with the sword and mete out punishment. To spare the lives of enemies, especially of enemies so barbarous and cruel as these, was not the custom of antiquity, least of all in the east. Pyrrhus (in Seneca) says: Lex nulla capto parcat aut penam impedit; and even Josephus (Ant. ix. 4, 3) makes Elisha say—what, however, he never did say—that it is right to kill captives taken in a just war. But Gideon, who respects the royalty of his captives, enemies though they be, would gladly spare them, and believes himself obliged at least to show them why he cannot do it. Through this circumstance, we hear of an occurrence otherwise unknown—a fact which may suggest and cause us to regret how much other information has perhaps failed to reach us. The kings, it seems, had caught and slain on Mount Tabor the brothers of Gideon, sons of the same mother<sup>2</sup> as well as father with himself. It is probable that this took place after some earlier battle, engaged in by Manassah—but without God's help—against the invaders. They were put to death, though only engaged in defending their native land, and though—as Zebah and Zalmunna flatteringly say—they looked like Gideon, like men of royal blood. In their persons, therefore, "kingly bearing," stately presence and chivalrous valor, had not been respected; and shall Gideon spare those who were robbers and murderers of seven years' standing? Impossible! Gideon's sword has been whetted for the very purpose of administering righteous judgment. When Turnus entreated Æneas for his life, the latter, remembering that the former had slain Pallas, the son of Evander, and "furiis accensus et ira terribilis," exclaimed, "Pallas te immolat," etc., and thrust the spear into his heart (Æneid, xii. 949). And yet Turnus was a native of the country, and fought against aliens, and Pallas was neither son nor brother of Æneas. The intimation that the family of Josiah had previously already bled for Israel, throws a new light on the question why of all men Gideon was selected to be the conqueror. However, notwithstanding their ill deserts, he does not treat his captives cruelly. He neither makes them objects of taunt or insult, nor uses them for purposes of ostentation and self-glorification. He does not load them with ignominy, as Sapor is said to have done to the Roman Emperor Valerian, and, according to the legend in Eutychius, Galerius to a Sapor, and Tamerlane to Bajazet.<sup>3</sup> The honor of the captives was sufficiently consulted, even when Gideon wished to make his eldest son the executor of his sentence. But he, a boy, and apparently of timid bearing, shrinks from drawing his sword against the mighty foemen, still distinguished by royal state and show. And truly, they must have been terrible warriors; they ask not for life, as Turnus and Homeric warriors do, but desire to be slain by the hand of an equal, and not to be hacked and hewn by the sword of a boy; for, say they, "as the man, so is his strength." They have no other request to make than that Gideon will kill them himself; and he complies with it—they fall by his sword. The "moons" which have hitherto ornamented their camels' necks, he now takes off; an evidence that even in captivity they have experienced kingly treatment. That he does not take them off until after the kings are dead, indicates that they are the special insignia of royalty, and crescent-shaped. Thus, according to Philostratus (lib. ii. cap. 1), Apollonius of Tyana received the convoy of a camel from the Persian king, which headed the train, and by a golden ornament on its face indicated its royal ownership. In the poem of Statius (cf. Bochart, Hierozoicon, i. 17) the horse of Parthenopæus, the fabled assailant of Thebes, wears crescent-shaped ornaments (lunata monilia). Mention is made of an Arabic expression, which speaks of "moon-shaped camel ornaments" (Ritter, xii. 486). The ornament, in its peculiar shape, was evidently an escutcheon of the ancient Ishmaelites, who were worshippers of the moon (Herod. iii. 8), as Scripture also speaks of a son of Joktan, the progenitor of many Arab tribes, whose name was Jerah, moon (Gen. x. 26). The crescent of the Arabizing Ottomans of modern times may be referred to it as to its original. For the lunule also, which adorned the shoes of ancient Roman senators and nobles, and whose significance was obscure even to antiquity (Plut. Quest. Rom., 73), had only the shape of the half-moon.

CHAPTER VIII. 22-32.

- 22 Then [And] the men of Israel said unto Gideon, Rule thou over us, both thou, and thy son, and thy son's son also: for thou hast delivered us from the hand of Midian. And Gideon said unto them, I will not rule over you, neither shall my son rule over you: the Lord [Jehovah] shall rule over you. And Gideon said unto them, I would desire a request of you, that you would give me every man the ear-rings [the ring]<sup>1</sup> of his prey. (For they had golden ear-rings [rings], because [for] they were Ishmaelites.) And they answered, We will willingly give them. And they spread a garment,<sup>2</sup> and did cast therein every man the ear-rings [ring] of his prey. And the weight of the golden ear-rings [rings] that he requested, was a thousand and seven hundred shekels of gold; beside [apart from the] ornaments [moons], and [the] collars [ear-drops], and [the] purple raiment [garments] that was [were] on the kings of Midian, and beside [apart from] the chains [collars] that were about their camels' necks. And Gideon made an ephod thereof, and put it in his city, even in Ophrah: and all Israel went thither [omit: thither] a whoring after it [there]: which thing [and it i. e. the ephod] became a snare unto Gideon, and to his house. Thus was Midian subdued [But Midian was humbled] before the children [sons] of Israel, so that they lifted up their heads no more. And the country was in quietness<sup>3</sup> forty years in the days of Gideon. And Jerubbaal the son of Joash went and dwelt in his own house. And Gideon had three-score and ten sons of his body begotten: for he had many wives. And his concubine that was in Shechem, she also bare him a son, whose name he [they]<sup>4</sup> called Abimelech. And Gideon the son of Joash died in a good old age, and was buried in the sepulchre of Joash his father, in Ophrah of the Abi-ezrites.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 24. — תָּרִי, ring; whether ear-ring or nose-ring, the word itself does not declare. Cassel and De Wette both render it by the singular (De Wette, Ohrring). It is used as a collective, and simply indicates the class of ornaments desired, without any reference to the number which each man was supposed to have, or was expected to give. This indefinite singular is best rendered in English by the plural, as in R. V. — TR.]

[2 Ver. 25. — לְבָשׁוֹת: Dr. Cassel, ein Gewand, "a garment." The definite article simply indicates the garment used on the occasion. The term לְבָשׁוֹת, though also used in the general sense of garment and raiment, is

[4 Ver. 31. — וַיִּשָּׂא הָאֱלֹהִים] Dr. Ossel: man nannte seinen Namen. Bertheau also takes וַיִּשָּׂא as the indeterminate 3d pers. (see Ges. Gr. 137, 3), and says: "the name sounds like a nickname, given him because his lordship was of such brief duration, and he so very far from being Father of a King." The difficulty is that the text gives no hint of a change of subject. But cf. the commentary below, and Keil's view in note on p. 140. — Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL

An extraordinary victory had been gained — a triumph without a parallel. A glory surrounds Gideon in the eyes of Israel, such as had distinguished no one else within the memory of men. Who can stand beside him? How has the arrogance and vain-glory of Ephraim been put to shame! Having caught a couple of princes, already fleeing for their lives, they ceased from the conflict, though still far from finished. Gideon, whose courage began, and whose untiring energy prosecuted the war, has also finished it. He has captured and destroyed, not princes (שָׂרִים) merely, but — as the narrative emphatically intimates — the kings (מְלָכִים) themselves. And what kings! The chiefs of all Midian. Kings, therefore, whose defeat and capture was of the greatest consequence, as the narrative sufficiently indicates by the constant repetition of their names. Their names, also, like those of the "princes," are peculiar; those were borrowed from animals, these from "sacrifice" and "carved work." The latter therefore indicate perhaps the conjunction of priestly with royal authority. Nor did Gideon smite the hostile armies in his own country merely, but he ventured far into a strange land. To pursue a great army into the rock desert, and as it were drag the enemy out of his hiding-place, was an exploit of the most astounding character. Who but Gideon would have dared to enter the terrible Harra, there to seize his royal prey? Apart from this, how imposing his assurance, his wisdom, his moderation and strength! If men admired the discreteness of his answer to Ephraim, they were startled by the punishment of Succoth and Peniel, and the terrible recompense meted out to the kings. Success carries the day with the people: how surprising, grand, and dazzling was its form on this occasion! The people feel that now they have a man among them, who towers, not physically, but in soul and spirit, far above them all. No wonder that Israel, gathered from all quarters to see the hero and his captures, urgently presses him, and says: —

Ver. 22. Rule over us, thou, thy son, and thy son's son. This is the language of gratitude and admiration. Excited, and, like all multitudes, easily carried away by momentary impulses of joy and approval, they offer him the supreme authority, and even propose to make it hereditary. It is only done, however, in a storm of excitement. Nor do they propose that he shall be their מֶלֶךְ, but their מֹשֶׁל — not their King, but their Imperator. What they desire is to be not only for his honor, but also for their welfare. His family is to continue forever the champion of Israel. But in this vehement urgency of the moment, the people show how little they comprehend, notwithstanding this and many other great events of their history, to whom they are really indebted for victory. They show that they regard the strength by which Gideon has conquered to be physical, rather than moral. Thou shalt rule, for thou hast delivered us from Midian. They fail to perceive the contradiction to which they give utterance when they talk of an hereditary "Judge," or as they word it, "ruler." It belongs to the essence of a Judge, that he be raised up by the Spirit, and filled with the strength of God. He is God's military ambassador to a people that has no king. Not the people, but God, had made Gideon what he was — their military leader and commander. His children will not be able to lead the nation, unless they also are called by God. The kingship is hereditary, because it rests on the broad basis of established order, and not merely on the endowments of extraordinary persons. The divinely inspired imperator can at most transmit only his treasures. It was not without a purpose that the narrative told of the timid boy, Jether, Gideon's first-born. Will he — if God do not call him — be able to smite the Midianites? and if he be not able, will the men of Israel obey him? None the less great, however, was the temptation for Gideon. He on whom but recently Ephraim looked superciliously down, has now the offer of dominion over Israel laid at his feet. It requires more strength to resist the allurements of proffered power, than to defeat an enemy. But Gideon is a great man, greater than Washington, to whom absolute dominion was not offered, and who accepted the Presidency because he would obey, "the voice of the people," saying as he did so, that "no people could be more bound to acknowledge and adore the invisible hand which conducts the affairs of men, than the people of the United States" (cf. Marshall's Life of Washington, ii. 146).

Ver. 23. And Gideon said unto them, I will not rule over you, neither shall my son rule over you: Jehovah shall rule over you. God — not "Elohim," but "Jehovah," the God of Israel — is your only Imperator. With this he repels the idea that he was the sole and real conqueror, as also the supposition that any others than those whom God calls can be of service. He declares, moreover, that God must be obeyed, because He is the Ruler; and that as in this war against Midian victory was gained only because his (Gideon's) orders were followed, so victory will always be contingent on obedience to God.

With these words Gideon worthily crowns his heroic deeds; and there he should have stopped. But the moment that he connects the cause of God with a measure of his own, albeit with the best intentions, he falls into error, and without designing it leads the people astray.

Vers. 24–26. Give me, every man, the ring of his booty. Since the rings were taken from men, they must be understood to be ear-rings, the use of which, especially among the ancients, was to a great extent common to both men and women. In Ceylon and among the Burmese, the perforation of the ears is to this day, for both sexes, a religious ceremony; just as the habit of wearing rings did not have its origin solely in desire for finery. The observations of modern travellers among the Arabs, are confined to female ornaments, but "sons" also wore such rings as are here mentioned, even among the Israelites (Ex. xxxii. 2). Plautus (Pamulus, v. 2, 32) says jeeringly of the Carthaginians: "Digitos in manibus non habent, quia incedunt cum annulatis auribus" (cf. Serarius). The explanation, "they had golden rings, for they were Ishmaelites,"<sup>1</sup> is to be referred, not to the rings, but to the material of which they were made. It calls attention to the love of finery and splendor which then as now characterized the Arab tribes,<sup>2</sup> and at the same time accounts for the wealth of gold implied in the possession of so many rings of that metal by the Midianitish army. Gold is still extensively used by the Arabs for the same purposes (cf. Ritter, xiv. 415, etc.; xv. 828, etc.).

The army must have been pervaded by thorough, even though temporary, enthusiasm for their heroic leader, since they willingly gave up the most valuable part of the booty, without knowing but that he wanted it for personal use. Accordingly, an abundance of gold rings were brought together. Now, for the first time, was Israel astounded at the magnitude of the spoil; now was it seen that the man who formerly ranked his harvest second to the gleanings of Ephraim, had obtained glory and wealth beyond comparison. For not only were 1,700 shekels of gold handed over to him at this time, but to him also belonged (for ver. 26 speaks only of his possessions) the moons (ver. 21), the וְהַיָּרֵחַ, and the purple garments of the kings, and the decorations of their camels. The וְהַיָּרֵחַ are ear-pendants, made of pearls and precious stones,<sup>3</sup> peculiar to their kings, in distinction from the simple rings worn by all other Midianites. The name signifies a "drop," which the pearl resembled. The Greek σταλγμίον, with which Gesenius compares it, I have met with only in Plautus (Menechmei, iii. 3) as stalagma. The monument of Cyrus was adorned with ear-pendants of precious stones (Arrian, vi. 29). Procopius represents the Persian king Pherozes with a costly pearl hanging from his right ear (Brisson, De Regno Pers., p. 83). Among the Indians, persons of distinction wore precious stones in their ears (Curtius, viii. 9, 21). In the Ramayana it is stated, that in Ayodhya no one was without ear-pendants (akundali) and other ornaments (Bohlen, Altes Indien, ii. 170). — Great wealth stood now at Gideon's command; but he had no thought of appropriating the gifts of the men of Israel to himself. All that he retained was the booty which had fallen to him from the Midianitish kings. Hannibal also, caused the rings of the Roman knights who fell at Cannæ to be collected by the peck (Liv. xxiii. 12), — but Gideon has no Punic ends in view.

Vers. 27, 28. And Gideon made an ephod thereof.<sup>4</sup> The high-priestly significance of the ephod is clearly explained in Ex. xxviii. It is the special sacred garment, by which Aaron and his sons are distinguished as priests. With the ephod, the breastplate is connected, fastened to it by strings, and not to be displaced (Ex. xxviii. 28). This garment, with the breastplate, the high priest wears in the sanctuary. With it therefore are connected the Urim and Thummim, through which divine instructions are imparted, and to which, after the death of Moses and Joshua, Israel applies for directions. It is this high-priestly character of the ephod, and the gift of prophetic communication through the Urim and Thummim of its breastplate (cf. 1 Sam. xxx. 7), that explains the consecration of such a garment by Gideon. Its procurement is closely connected with the words: "Jehovah shall rule over you." The people has been saved by God's revelation of Himself to Gideon. To his service, therefore, the choicest of the spoil must be devoted. Not on man, but on Him, is hope to be built. He will say what the people are to do. Through the priestly ephod, the heavenly King will speak, and rule his obedient people. The consecration of the ephod, therefore, as that with which the Urim and Thummim are connected, expresses the truth that God governs; and is Gideon's declaration that He, and not any human Imperator, is to be honored.

Thus far, Gideon's action was blameless, and worthy of his faith. But he "deposited" the ephod in his city, in Ophrah.<sup>5</sup> Now, Ophrah was not the seat of the common sanctuary, the tabernacle, nor of the national priesthood. And though the priestly family of that day may have been in a decline, though the tribe of Ephraim, among whom it had at that time its principal seat, gave unequivocal evidence of unbelieving pride, on which account alone Gideon might hesitate to commit the oracle to their keeping; yet, all these reasons, however indicative of spiritual wisdom, were not sufficient to authorize the consecration of an ephod, and the establishment of a priesthood, in Ophrah. It was the inauguration of a separate sanctuary, the establishment, so to speak, of an opposition ephod, under the controlling influence of Gideon. The ecclesiastical centre of Israel was thus severed from the tabernacle. The hero, notwithstanding his personal fidelity to God, evinces herein conceptions of Israel's calling too subjective to be secure against disastrous error. The result soon makes this apparent.

And all Israel went a whoring after it. The expositions of recent interpreters, who ascribe to Gideon the erection of a golden calf, are founded

<sup>1</sup> BARNES: "Ishmaelites is the general name of a number of tribes, among whom the Midianites, though according to Gen. xiv. 2, not descended from Ishmael, but from Keturah, were also reckoned, cf. Gen. xxxvii. 25, 28; xxxix. 1." — See also above, on ch. vi. 1. — Ta.]

<sup>4</sup> KELL: "It is not necessary so to understand this, as if the 1,700 shekels (fifty lbs.) of gold were worked up into the ephod, but only that the expense of making it was defrayed with this money." — WORDSWORTH: "The immense quantity of gold was probably bestowed not only on the robe itself, but on the chains andouches, and settings of the stones on the shoulders, and on the breastplate, and on the setting of the stones therein; and perhaps also in the purchase of the precious stones for the shoulders, and for the workmanship of the whole." — Ta.]

[Kell remarks: "וְהָיָה וְהָיָה" does not say, he set it up; but may as well mean, he preserved it, in his city Ophrah, וְהָיָה is nowhere used of the erection of an image or statue; and signifies, not only to place, but also to lay down (e. g. ch. vi. 37), and to let stand, leave behind, Gen. xxxiii. 15." — Ta.]

in utter misapprehension. The use of rings by Aaron in casting his idol, was simply the result of his having no other gold, and has surely no tendency to establish a necessary connection between the collection of rings and the casting of golden calves. The establishment by the recreant Micah, in the closing part of our Book, of "an ephod and a graven image," is itself evidence that he who only consecrated an ephod, did not erect an image. Gideon, with the words "Jehovah shall rule!" on his lips, cannot intend to give up that for which he has risked his life—fidelity towards the God who will have no graven images. The erection of an idol image is the worst of sins. It was from that very sin that Gideon had delivered his people; he was the Contender against Baal, the destroyer of idol altars,—the man who would not even suffer himself to be made Imperator, an idol of the people. Gideon continues faithful to the moment of his death, which he reaches in a good old age. If, nevertheless, Israel goes a whoring after the ephod, this was no part of Gideon's wish; still, the snare was of his laying, because he placed the ephod "in his own house." He thought that by that means the people would better remember from what distress they had been delivered; but it is the nature of the multitude to pervert even faith into superstition. They come to Ophrah with worship and prayer for direction, because this particular ephod is there—not because they seek to honor God, but because this is Gideon's ephod. *They regard not the word which issues from the breastplate to him who believes in God, but only the fact that the ephod is made of the spoils of Midian. Thus they turn Gideon's faith into superstition; and Israel's moral strength, instead of being increased, is weakened. The unwholesome desire has been excited to present worship, not in the customary place, but wherever the subjective sense of novelty allures the worshipper. If Gideon had not consecrated the ephod in his house, it had not become a snare for Israel. It helped him indeed to retain the leadership of Israel, under the supremacy of Jehovah; but by it, discarding as it did the lawful priesthood, he led the people astray into an historical subjectivism instead of establishing them in their objective faith, and thus prepared the way for apostasy. For what but apostasy could follow at his death, when the popular faith became thus connected with his person, his government, and the ephod in his house? The hero erred, when he also made himself a priest. His house fell, because he undertook to make it a temple for the people. The ephod with the breastplate became a snare, because the God of Israel is not to be led by Gideon, but Gideon by Him—even though there be no ephod in his house.<sup>1</sup>

The renewed apostasy, however, for which the way was thus prepared, manifested itself only in the sequel. As long as Gideon lived, his powerful spirit kept the enemy in fear, and the people at rest. The effects of his achievement lasted forty years, although the hero, refusing dominion, had retired as a private person to his house and stayed there,—unlike Washington, who, though at the end of the war he returned with "inexpressible delight" to his country-seat at Mount Vernon on the Potomac, yet soon left it again, to become President of the new republic.

Vers. 29–32. And Jerubbaal, the son of Joash, went and dwelt in his own house. The surname Jerubbaal has not again called for attention, since the events which gave rise to it. But now, that Gideon's work is finished, the narrative, with a subtlety of thought that is surprising, speaks of him under this name. It was given him because he had overthrown the altar of Baal, for which the superstitious populace expected to see the vengeance of Baal overtake him (ch. vi. 32). The result shows that Baal is nothing. Gideon has smitten him and his servants, and is covered with success and glory. "There goes"—so speak the people among themselves—"Jerubbaal into his house; the greatest man in Israel, because he smote Baal." Baal is impotent against the faithful and valiant. Victory constantly attends his enemies, for God is with them. May this truth never be forgotten by our own people and princes! As long as he continued to live, Gideon had everything that ministered to fame and happiness in Israel—many sons, peace, riches, and a "good old age." The last expression is used of no one else but Abraham (Gen. xxv. 8); for of David it is employed not by the Book of Kings, but only by the late Chronicles (1 Chron. xxix. 28). The "goodness" of his old age consisted in his seeing the blessed results of his great deed of faith, continuing unbroken and unchanged as long as he lived. Nevertheless, the narrative already hints at the shadow which after his death darkened his house. In Shechem, a concubine bore him a son, whom they called Abimelech. אֲבִימֶלֶךְ, I think, refers not to Gideon, but indefinitely to those about the concubine; for it was in Shechem that the name originated. Gideon, who would not "rule," much less be king, would not have named his son, "My Father is King." On the other hand, it was but natural that the vanity of the concubine, when she bore a son to the great Gideon, the man of royal reputation and distinction, would gladly consent to have him named Abimelech.<sup>2</sup> This vanity of Shechem is the foundation of the coming tragedy.

Of no previous hero has the account been so extended. It is even mentioned that he was buried in his father's sepulchre, in the family vault. That also is a sign of his happy and peaceful end. Here also, as always at the close, the name of the hero's father is associated with his own, as a tribute of honor for the support he once afforded his son (ch. vi. 31); beyond this, however, nothing is recorded of him. Gideon, as conqueror, dwelt no longer in his father's house, but in his own (ver. 29); but at death he is buried in his father's tomb. In that tomb, the glory of Manasseh sleeps; he in whom, tradition declares, the blessing of Jacob on this grandson was fulfilled, and of whom the Midrash says, that what Moses was at an earlier time, that Gideon was in his.

is not the same as אֲבִימֶלֶךְ, to give one a name, to name him, but signifies to give one a by-name, to surname him, cf. Neh. ix. 7; Dan. v. 12 (Chald.). It follows from this, that Gideon gave Abimelech this name as a surname suitable to his character; consequently, not at his birth, but afterwards, as he grew up and developed characteristics which suggested it.—Ta.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Gideon puts kings to flight, pursues them like wild beasts to their dens, slays them with his own hand—an honor not allowed to Barak,—but himself will be no king. Dominion belongs to God, he says; for the victory was of God. It is not majorities that make a king in Israel, but the call of God by the mouth of his prophets. What Gideon had won, was not his. How should he take God's title, to whom everything in Israel belongs? So long as we render God what belongs to Him, we shall also have what properly falls to us. When Gideon inaugurated his ephod, he desired an honor for his house; and this only honor which he sought for himself, beyond that which he already had, proved the downfall of his house after him. Let us therefore seek first the kingdom of God: all other things will come of themselves. So soon as we seek to honor and immortalize ourselves beside God, our labor proves vain, and our glory falls into the dust.

LISCO: Gideon refuses to accede to the proposal of the people, because he is conscious that everything is to be ascribed only to the Lord, and that it would be nothing else than arbitrariness and self-seeking to accept the royal dignity without special direction from above.—GERLACH: He rejects the offered crown from genuine fidelity to the Lord whom alone he serves; but another temptation he fails to withstand.

HENRY: They honestly thought it very reasonable, that he who had gone through the toils and perils of their deliverance, should enjoy the honor and power of commanding them ever after; and very desirable, that he who in this great and critical juncture had had such manifest tokens of God's presence with him, should ever after preside in their affairs. Let us apply it to the Lord Jesus; He hath delivered us out of the hand of our enemies, our spiritual enemies, the worst and most dangerous, therefore it is fit He should rule over us; for how can we be better ruled, than by One that appears to have so great an interest in heaven, and so great a kindness for this earth?—BR. HALL: That which others plot and sue, and swear and bribe for (dignity and superiority), he seriously rejects, whether it were for that he knew God had not yet called them to a monarchy, or rather for that he saw the crown among thorns. Why do we ambitiously affect the command of these mole-hills of earth, when wise men have refused the proffers of kingdoms? Why do we not rather labor for that kingdom which is free from all cares, from all uncertainty?

WORDSWORTH: Gideon's history is a warning that it requires more than a good intention to make a good act; and that the examples of the best of men are not a safe guide of conduct; and the better the man is, the more will be the consequences of bad acts done by him. The only right rule of life is the Law of God.—THE SAME: Gideon is numbered among the saints of God in the epistle to the Hebrews (ch. xi. 32); but the saints of God were men, and no man is free from some blemish of human infirmity.—TR.]

CHAPTER VIII. 33-35.

33 And it came to pass as soon as Gideon was dead, that the children [sons] of Israel turned again, and went a whoring after [the] Baalim, and made Baal-berith
34 their god. And the children [sons] of Israel remembered not the Lord [Jehovah] their God, who had delivered them out of the hands of all their enemies on every 35 side: Neither showed they kindness to the house of Jerubbaal, namely, Gideon [Jerubbaal Gideon],<sup>1</sup> according to all the goodness<sup>2</sup> which he had showed unto Israel.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 35. — The word namely is added by the translators, who supposed, as Bertheau does, that the writer designed once more to point out the identity of Gideon with Jerubbaal. Cf. the Com. — TR.]

[2 Ver. 35. — כָּל־הַטּוֹבָה: Dr. Cassel: trotz aller Wohlthat, "notwithstanding all the good." The "notwithstanding" lies perhaps in the thought, but not in the language. — TR.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Vers. 33, 34. And it came to pass as soon as Gideon was dead. The fact soon became manifest that the people had been raised only by the personal character of Gideon; he is scarcely dead, before they fall back again. The narrator says sharply לָשׁוּבָה, "they returned." The same word which elsewhere describes the turning of the people towards God, is here used to indicate their passion for sin. Ad vomitum redierunt, as Serarius well remarks.

And went a whoring after the Baalim, and made Baal-berith their god. Nothing could put the stupid thoughtlessness of the people in a stronger light. They have become great and free through victory over Baal; and now they again run after him. Jerubbaal—the contender with Baal—has just died, and they enter into covenant with Baal (see on ch. ix. 4). That the nations in the Baal-covenant (Baal-berith) kept the peace towards them, was because Jehovah had given them victory,—and lo! they make idols their god! The error of Gideon, in supposing that by setting up his ephod he could preserve the people, now shows itself. Since he is dead, in whom they conceived their salvation to be personified, they think neither of the spoils out of which the ephod was made, nor of him who procured them. Ingratitude is the parent of all unbelief. Thankfulness comes from thought.<sup>1</sup> Israel thinks not on the God who has delivered it from all its enemies; how then should it think on the human hero when he has passed away. They withhold obedience from the God of their fathers; what recognition can they have for the house of their benefactor. The ephod, to be sure, was still in Ophrah; but who that despises the sanctuary of Moses and Joshua, will respect this private institute of Gideon, when his voice has ceased to be heard.

Ver. 35. Neither showed they kindness to the house of Jerubbaal Gideon. In the name Jerubbaal, all the hero's meritorious service, and its great results, are enunciated. For that reason the narrator mentions it here. It serves to aggravate the sinfulness of Israel's ingratitude, and to show that he who enters the service of Baal, will also ignore his obligations towards those who contend with Baal. The people are unwilling to be reminded that to fight against Baal brings prosperity. They seek to forget everything that admonishes to repentance. It has always been the case, that those who apostatize from God, do not do well by the "house" of God. — Notwithstanding all the benefits which he had shown unto Israel. The narrator intimates that the endeavor of Gideon to perpetuate, by means of the ephod, the religious and godly memory of his deeds, was altogether vain. For let no one imagine that where God's own deeds fail to command remembrance and gratitude, those of men, however deserving, can maintain themselves against the sinful sophistry of unbelief.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

[HENRY: Gideon being dead, the Israelites found themselves under no restraint, and went after Baalim. They went first after another ephod (ver. 27), for which Gideon had himself given them too much occasion, and now they went after another god. False worship made way for false deities. — SCOTT: As we all need so much mercy from our God, we should learn the more patiently to bear the ingratitude of our fellow-sinners, and the unsuitable returns we meet with for our poor services, and to resolve, after the divine example, "not to be overcome of evil, but to overcome evil with good." — TR.]

1 [The German is, "Dank kommt vom Denken." It is interesting to observe, whether the author meant to suggest it or not, that the remark is sound etymology as well as psychology. Grimm (Wörterb. ii. pp. 727, 927) derives both dank and denken from "the lost root diak, danc, dünken," expressive "of an action of the mind, a movement and uplifting of the soul." Thank and think belong, of course, to the same root. — TR.]

THE USURPED RULE OF ABIMELECH, THE FRATRICIDE AND THORN-BUSH KING.

The election and coronation of Abimelech. Jotham's parable.

CHAPTER IX. 1-21.

- 1 And Abimelech the son of Jerubbaal went to Shechem unto his mother's brethren, and communed with [spake unto] them, and with [unto] all the family of the
- 2 house of his mother's father, saying, Speak, I pray you, in the ears of all the men [lords]<sup>1</sup> of Shechem, Whether [Which] is better for you, either [omit: either] that all the sons of Jerubbaal, which are threescore and ten persons, reign [rule] over you, or that one reign [rule] over you?<sup>2</sup> remember also that I am your bone and
- 3 your flesh. And his mother's brethren spake of him in the ears of all the men [lords] of Shechem all these words: and their hearts inclined to follow [inclined
- 4 after] Abimelech; for they said, He is our brother. And they gave him threescore and ten pieces of silver out of the house of Baal-berith, wherewith Abimelech
- 5 hired vain [He empty, i. e. loose, worthless] and light [wanton, reckless] persons, which [and they] followed him. And he went unto his father's house at Ophrah, and slew his brethren the sons of Jerubbaal, being threescore and ten persons, upon one stone: notwithstanding, yet [and only] Jotham the youngest son of Jerubbaal was left;
- 6 for he hid himself. And all the men [lords] of Shechem gathered together, and all the house of Millo [all Beth-millo], and went and made Abimelech king, by the
- 7 plain [oak] of the pillar [monument]<sup>3</sup> that was in [is near] Shechem. And when [omit: when] they told it to Jotham, [and] he went and stood in [on] the top of mount Gerizim, and lifted up his voice, and cried, and said unto them, Hearken unto me, ye men [lords] of Shechem, that God may hearken unto you.<sup>4</sup> The trees went forth on a time to anoint a king over them; and they said unto the olive-tree, Reign thou over us. But the olive-tree said unto them, Should I leave my fatness,<sup>5</sup> wherewith by me they honour God and man,<sup>6</sup> and go to be promoted [go to wave] over the trees? And the trees said to the fig-tree, Come thou, and reign over us. But the fig-tree said unto them, Should I forsake<sup>7</sup> my sweetness, and my good fruit, and go to be promoted [to wave] over the trees? Then said the trees unto the vine, Come thou, and reign over us. And the vine said unto them, Should I leave<sup>8</sup> my wine [must], which cheereth God and man, and go to be promoted [to wave] over the trees? Then said all the trees unto the bramble [thornbush], Come thou, and reign over us. And the bramble [thornbush] said unto the trees, If in truth [i. e. in good earnest] ye anoint me king over you, then come and put your trust [take shelter] in my shadow: and [but] if not, let fire come out of the bramble [thornbush], and devour the cedars of Lebanon. Now therefore, if ye have done truly and sincerely, in that ye have made Abimelech king, and if ye have dealt well with Jerubbaal and his house, and have done unto him according to the deserving of his hands: (For my father fought for you, and adventured his life far,<sup>9</sup> and delivered you out of the hand of Midian: And ye are risen up against my father's house this day, and have slain his sons, three score and ten persons, upon one stone, and have made Abimelech, the son of his maid-servant, king over the men [lords] of Shechem, because he is your brother:) If ye then have dealt truly and sincerely with Jerubbaal and with his house this day, then rejoice ye in Abimelech, and let him also rejoice in you: But if not, let fire come out from Abimelech, and devour the men [lords] of Shechem, and the house of Millo [and Beth-millo]; and let fire come out from the men [lords] of Shechem, and from the house of Millo [from Beth-millo], and devour Abimelech. And Jotham ran away, and fled, and went to Beer, and dwelt there, for fear of Abimelech his brother.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 2. — עַלְלִי: used interchangeably with אֲנֹכִי, cf. ver. 46 with 49; 2 Sam. xxi. 12, with ii. 4, 5. See also ch. xi. 6, and Josh. xxiv. 11. Dr. Cassel: Herren; De Wette, and many others, Bürger, "citizens." — Tr.]

[2 Ver. 2. — The E. V. unnecessarily departs from the order of the Hebrew, and thereby obscures the antithesis which is primarily between "seventy" and "one," and secondarily between "sons of Jerubbaal" and "your bone and flesh," thus: "Which is better for you, that seventy men, all sons of Jerubbaal, rule over you, or that one man rule over you? Remember, also," etc. — Tr.]

[3 Ver. 6. — עָלָה: "The explanation of מִצָּבָה is doubtful. מִצָּבָה, anything 'set up,' is in Isa. xxix. 8 a military post [garrison], but may also mean a monument, and designates here probably the great stone set up (Josh. xxiv. 26) under the oak or terebinth near Shechem (cf. Gen. xxxv. 4)." De Wette also renders: Denkmal-Eiche, "monument-oak." — Tr.]

[4 Ver. 7. — Dr. Cassel translates: "and may God hear you." This is very well, but hardly in the sense in which he takes it, see below. Whether we translate as in the E. V., or as Dr. Cassel, the realization of the second member of the address must be regarded as contingent upon that of the first. — Tr.]

[5 Vers. 9, 11, 12. — הִתְנַחֵם: According to Ewald (Gram., 61 c.) הִתְנַחֵם is a contracted hiphil form (for הִתְנַחֵם), the second הִ being dropped in order to avoid the concurrence of too many gutturals, and the resulting הִתְנַחֵם (cf. Gen. Gr. 22, 4) being changed into הִתְנַחֵם in order to distinguish the interrogative particle more sharply. Others regard it as hophal (see Green, 53, 2, b). But as there are no traces anywhere else of either of these conjugations in this verb, it is commonly viewed as a simple kal form = הִתְנַחֵם. Kell seeks to explain the anomalous vowel under הִ by saying that "the obscure o-sound is substituted for the regular a in order to facilitate the pronunciation of successive guttural syllables." Dr. Cassel renders: "Have I then lost [better: given up] my fatness?" But as the notion of futurity must manifestly be contained in the following הִתְנַחֵם, the ordinary rendering, "Should I give up?" is preferable. — Tr.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Ver. 1. Shechem was a chief city in Ephraim (cf. Josh. xxiv. 1). That tribe still continued to be jealous of the consideration to which under Gideon Manasseh had attained. Though Gideon was now dead, the ephod was still in Ophrah, and the house of Gideon continued to hold a certain degree of authority. The narrative distinguishes between the sons of Gideon and Abimelech. While ch. viii. 30 states that Gideon had seventy sons by "many wives" (רַב־נָשִׁים), ver. 31 remarks that the mother of Abimelech was a concubine (פְּדִיָּה), in Shechem.<sup>1</sup> Just this son, an Ephraimite on his mother's side, bore the name of Abimelech, "My Father is King." The origin of that lust after power, which manifests itself in his wild and ambitious heart, is thus psychologically explained.

Vers. 2, 3. For they said, He is our brother. Abimelech, when he turned to Shechem with his criminal plans, was perfectly acquainted with the vain-glorious lust after power indulged in by the Ephraimites. He knew that it irritated them, to hear of the "rule of the seventy sons of Gideon." Gideon, it is true, desired no dominion, nor could his sons exercise it; but the centre of distinction was nevertheless at Ophrah, in his house, where the ephod was. The negotiations into which Abimelech now enters with Shechem are very instructive. They show, first, that the distinction which the ephod conferred on the house of Gideon, although it implied no claim to dominion, properly speaking, was yet the very thing which, by exciting envy, became a snare to that house; and, secondly, that Shechem, as Gideon's heir, will nevertheless not surrender this distinction, but desires to transfer it to one of its own people. The narrative is throughout of a tragic cast. Precisely those things which should exhort to greatness and faithfulness, are shamefully metamorphosed by sin into incentives to treason and mischief. In the hearts of the "lords of Shechem," no voice of truth or justice raises itself against the unnatural plan of Abimelech. They convict him not of falsehood, by pointing out that his brothers do not exercise dominion, but support his project, because he is their brother, and by him they will rule. It is manifest that the whole of Shechem is morally depraved. As Abimelech, so his kindred; and as they, so all the Shechemites were disposed.

Vers. 4, 5. And they gave him seventy silver-pieces out of the house of Baal-berith. Israel was forbidden to enter into covenant (berith) with the nations round about (cf. ch. ii. 2). The first symptom of apostasy among them, was always the inclination to remove the barriers between themselves and their heathen neighbors. The concessions required to make the establishment of covenant relations possible, were altogether one-sided: it was always Israel, and Israel only, that surrendered any part of its faith. The worship of a Baal-berith was the symbol of fellowship with the heathen, whereby the command to make no covenants was violated. His temple was the point of union for both parties. The support of Abimelech in his undertaking came from all the worshippers of Baal-berith; for was it not directed against the house of Jerubbaal, the declared enemy of Baal? Such being its character, it had moreover a proper claim on the treasures of the temple of Baal-berith. What a disgrace, when the son of the "Baal-vanquisher" takes money from the temple of that same Baal, for the purpose of murdering his brothers! What a victory of Satan over the youthful votary of ambition! And cheap enough was the price of blood. The idle rabble who hired themselves as body-guard to Abimelech, received a silver-piece, i. e. a shekel, for the head of each of Gideon's sons. However vague the impression we get of a piece of money in that age by computing its equivalent in our coin, it is nevertheless frightful to think how little it cost (scarcely more than half a dollar), to procure the performance of the most horrible deed.

And he slew his brethren. Abimelech is a perfect type of the tyrant, as he frequently appears in Greek history, continental and insular, and also, in more recent times, on Italian soil. Machiavelli (Prince, ch. viii.) says, that "whoever seizes a crown, unjustly and violently, must, if cruelty be necessary, exercise it to the full at once, in order to avoid the necessity of beginning it anew every day." In support of this maxim, he refers, first to Agathocles, and then to the petty tyrant of Fermo, Oliverotto, who in order to become master of the city, caused his uncle, who was also his foster-father, friend, and benefactor, to be traitorously slain at a banquet. — Only one escaped, the youngest, Jotham by name. The confession of Jehovah, which this name of his youngest son implies, evidences the constant piety and faithfulness of Gideon, and confirms our conjecture that not he, but Shechem, invented the name Abimelech.

Ver. 6. And all the lords of Shechem held an assembly. Gideon's sons being murdered, an election of a king now takes place. As the electors, so their king. The noble undertaking had succeeded; the house of Gideon was destroyed. What a contrast! After the glorious victory over Midian, Gideon, though urgently besought by the men of many tribes, will not consent to continue to be even their imperator; now, the Shechemites raise the assassin of his brothers to the dignity of a king! A kingship like that of the heathen cities on the coast, with no law, but with plenty of blood, without the oil of consecration, but steeped in sin, is thus violently and vain-gloriously set up by Shechem and its fortress (Beth-Millo<sup>2</sup>); and that too, with a reckless hardihood as great as that which characterized the preliminary murders, in a spot consecrated by sacred memories. There where Joshua, before he died (Josh. xxiv. 25, 26), made a covenant with the people on God's behalf, where he had solemnly bound them to the observance of the law, and where they had promised to obey God alone, — there, at the great stone, set up by Joshua under the oak, two apostate, self-seeking cities, stained with murder and unbelief, elect a son of Jerubbaal, who suffered himself to be bought in the interest of Baal, to be their king! For the coronation, the narrative tells us, took place עַם אֵלֹהֵי מִלּוֹ, at the monument-oak, are all the inhabitants of the citadel, the same who in ver. 46 are spoken of as 'all the citizens of Migdol or the Tower.' BERTHAUD: "The high plateau of Mt. Gerizim, by which the city (Shechem) is commanded, seems to offer the most suitable site for this Millo, as it also did for later fortifications (Rob. ii. 277, 278, comp. p. 294). This location of the fortress, at some little distance from the city, which lay in the narrow valley, would explain the distinction constantly maintained in our chapter between the inhabitants of Shechem and the house, i. e. population, of Millo or the Tower." — Ta.]

<sup>2</sup> [KEL: "Millo is unquestionably the name of the fortress or citadel of the city of Shechem, the same with the Tower of Shechem in vers. 46-49. The word מִלּוֹ (Millo), as also the Chaldees מִלְיָרָה, 'filling,' signifies a rampart formed of two walls, the space between which is 'filled up' with rubbish. There was also a Millo at Jerusalem, 2 Sam. v. 9; 1 Kgs. ix. 15. 'All the house of Millo,' near Shechem."<sup>1</sup> And though nothing further is said about the place, it may nevertheless be inferred, from the connection and the tragic character of the occurrence, that the narrator, in bringing its locality to the mind of the reader, designs to make the shameful character of the transaction more strikingly evident, just as throughout this passage he constantly writes Jerubbaal, not Gideon, in order to render more prominent the contrast between these servants and that great victor of Baal.<sup>2</sup>

Ver. 7. And they told it to Jotham. While the preparations for the coronation are in progress, tidings of them are brought to Jotham, the last scion of the stock of Gideon. What shall he do? The whole nation is fallen into listlessness and inactivity. The horrible massacre has called forth no rising. Even those tribes who had perhaps heard of it, but took no part in it, continue quiescent. Sin has dulled every nerve of courage and gratitude. The son of the hero still receives intelligence; a few helpers are with him in his flight; a few others perhaps sigh with him in secret: but beyond this, he is alone. The spirit, however, of his father, has not left him. While below they crown the fratricide, he appears above, on the rock, like an impersonation of conscience. So the modern poet, with like grandeur of conception, makes Tell appear on the rock above the tyrant. Jotham's arrow, however, is not sped from the fatal bow, but from a noble spirit. It is the arrow of parabolic discourse, dipped in personal grief and divine retribution, that he sends down among them. Mount Gerizim was the mount of blessing (Deut. xxvii. 12); but through the sin of Shechem, it becomes, in the parable of Jotham, a mount of judgment. Its present name, already borne in the Middle Ages, is el Tûr (the Mountain). It rises to a height of eight hundred feet above the present Nâblus (Rob. ii. 276). Jotham probably appeared on some projecting point, near enough to be heard, and distant enough to be not easily caught.<sup>3</sup> Hearken unto me, he says, and may God hear you. He wishes them to hear his parable, as he desires God (Elohim) to hear the coronation rejoicings that rise up from the valley.

Vers. 8-21. The parable belongs to the most remarkable productions of Israelitish life, not only on account of its political significance, but also for what may be called its literary character. Fable and so-called apologue are of oriental, non-Israelitish, as also non-Grecian, origin. They spring from a pantheism in which trees and animals furnished symbols for expressing the popular ideas. Although rooted in the religious vivification of nature, their employment was nevertheless brought to maturity by the pressure of social necessities. In the East, fable and tale were always the weapons of mind against violence and tyranny (cf. my Edtischen Studien, p. 15). They furnished the people with individual consolation against general misery. In their original appearance among the Greeks also, they fail not to exhibit this character. In the same way, Jotham speaks to the tyrants of Shechem in this popular language, which all understand. He does not speak like a prophet, for he is none, and Baal has stopped the ears of his auditors. He does not even speak of the power and mighty deeds of Jehovah, from whom his own name is derived. He speaks of "Elohim" and his retributions — of the Deity in the general sense in which the heathen also acknowledge him. He speaks altogether in their language, popularly, with popular wisdom. But what a difference between the moral strength which justifies Jotham to put forth his parable, and (for instance) the motives of the Greek Archilochus. There we hear the wounded vanity of a rejected suitor; here, one solitary voice of indignation and truth against the tyrant and murderer. By this moral motive, Jotham elevates the parable to the level of the divine word, and furnishes the first illustration of how a popular form of discourse, the offspring of directly opposite principles, could be employed for moral purposes, and (in the parables of Christ) become a medium for the highest doctrines and mysteries. Jotham gives a parable and points out its application (from ver. 16 onward); but also apart from the latter, the narrative conveys an independent political idea with a force which has scarcely been equalled by any subsequent expression of it. It manifests a political consciousness so mature, as to surprise one who looks at the apparently simple and common-place relations of the time and people.

The trees will have a king. No reason is given, but the history of Israel, to which reference is had, furnishes one. People felt that in the dangers of war, one common leadership was important. They supposed that their frequent sufferings at the hands of Moab and Midian, were owing to defects in their form of government. They would have a king, in order to be able, as in their folly they think they shall be, to dispense with obedience to the commands of God. Gideon says: God is your Ruler. The apostate people will fill his place with a king, and think that in their selection, they act in accordance with the will of God.

Offers of kingly dignity are seldom refused. Solon, properly speaking, never received a tender of royalty; and Otto, Duke of Saxony, the father of Henry I. was already too old to bear such a <sup>1</sup> מִשְׁכָּנִי is most probably to be taken as מִשְׁכָּנִי or מִשְׁכָּנִי.

<sup>2</sup> [Kerro (Daily Bible Illustrations: Moses and the Judges, p. 385): — "It will occur to the reader to ask what right the people of Shechem had to nominate a king, by their sole authority. In the first place, it must be remembered that the land had formerly been governed by a number of petty kings, ruling over some strong town and its immediate district and dependent villages; and it is likely that the Shechemites claimed no more than to appoint Abimelech as such a king over themselves, assuming that they for themselves, whatever might be the view of others, had a right to choose a king to reign over them. Besides, Shechem was one of the chief towns of Ephraim; and that proud and powerful tribe always claimed to take the leading part in public affairs. If not to determine the course of the other tribes — except, perhaps, of those connected with Judah in the south. It was under the influence of this desire for supremacy, that the revolt against the house of David was organized in that tribe, and resulted in the establishment of the separate kingdom for the ten tribes, in which Ephraim had the chief influence. Indeed, that establishment of a separate monarchy was accomplished at this very place where Abimelech is now declared king. Taking all this into account, it may seem reasonable to conclude that the Shechemites had the support of the tribe in this transaction, or might at least reckon with reasonable confidence upon its not being withheld. Then, again, a king chosen at Shechem, and supported by this powerful tribe, might reasonably calculate that the other tribes would soon give in their adhesion, seeing that, in the time of his father, their monarchical predilections had been so strongly manifested." — Ta.]

burden (as Widukind says, Ipsæ vero quasi jam gravior annis recusabat imperii onus). The good trees, however, notwithstanding their strength, will not be elected; they deem the species of royalty which is offered them, too insignificant to warrant the sacrifice of what they already possess. The olive tree, fig tree, and grape-vine, enjoy sufficient honor, happiness, and distinction, not to prefer this sort of coronation to their present activity. They will rather continue in a condition which secures their personal worth, than go to "wave over the trees." It is a beautiful image of popular favor, uncertain, unequal, affected by every wind, which is afforded by the branches of trees, never at rest, always waving. The proffered royalty is dependent on popular favor. It is a royalty which must bend to every breeze, if it would avoid a fall. For they to whom the office is offered, are too noble to use the means necessary to maintain their authority when popular favor deserts them. They must first have lost their nobility of nature, before they can follow the call now made to them. It was a noble king of recent times, who, from similar motives, strenuously resisted to accept what was offered him.

It is very significant that this doctrine proceeds from Jotham, the son of Gideon. He has his eye, of course, on the refusal of the crown by his father; only he brings the negative side of that refusal into special prominence. He makes it evident that even then the fickle and disoriental character of popular favor and popular will was thoroughly apprehended. But one needed to be the son of a divinely called hero, to be able to set forth with cutting force the unprincipled conduct of revolutionary malcontents. Against a true kingship, as afterwards established in Israel, and which in its idea forms the highest perfection of the theocracy, Jotham says nothing. The people that applies to Samuel for a king, is a very different one from these criminal Shechemites, who attempt to get a king in opposition to God. These latter, for this reason, can only use a king who has nothing to lose, and is worthy of them: whose fit symbol is the thorn-bush. Sin loves arbitrariness; therefore they deserve a tyrant. The thorn-bush is the type of persons who, after they have accepted power offered by bloody hands, are qualified to preserve it by bloody means.

The æsthetic beauty of the parable is also to be noted. Trees afford the best representation of a republic; each tree has its own sphere of action, and no one is in a position to exercise any special influence over the others. Whoever among them would attempt this in the character of king, must, so to speak, leave the soil in which he is planted, and hover over them all. Their will would then be for him, what otherwise the nourishing earth is for all. Any productive tree would thereby lose its fruit. For the unfruitful thorn-bush alone, the office would involve no loss. The fable is especially beautiful as typical of Israelitish relations. The tribes are all equal. Like the trees, they all receive their strength from God. If they withdraw themselves from Him, in order to crown the thorn-bush, they will experience that which issues from the thorn-bush — namely, fire.

The profound significance of the parable is inexhaustible. Its truth is of perpetual recurrence. More than once was Israel in the position of the Shechemites; then especially, when He whose kingdom is not of this world, refused to be a king. Then, too, Herod and Pilate became friends. The thorn-bush seemed to be king when it encircled the head of the Crucified. But Israel experienced what is here denounced: a fire went forth, and consumed city and people, temple and fortress.

And they said to the olive-tree. The olive tree is already a king among trees in his own right; hence, Columella calls it "the first among trees." His product is used to honor both "God and man." His oil consecrates "kings and priests," and feeds the light that burns in the sanctuary of God. The olive tree is the symbol of peaceful royalty; its leaf and branch are signs of reconciliation and peace: hence, Israel in its divine glory is compared to the "beautiful olive tree" (Hos. xiv. 6).

Denying the request of the trees, the olive tree says: "Have I then lost (הֲיָדָוְלִי, an unusual form, which with Keil I regard as a simple Kal) my oil, that I should wave over the trees?" Has Israel then lost its life of peace in God, its sacred anointing through God's servants, its pious light and life in God's law? Has it grown poor as to its God, that it must suffer itself to be governed by heathen arts? The product of the olive tree and the deeds of Abimelech stand in the sharpest contrast with each other.

The same result follows an application to the fig tree. This also is a symbol of that divine peace which fills the land when God governs. The ancients believed that if a wild, untamed bullock were fastened to a fig tree, he would become quiet and gentle (Plutarch, Symposium, lib. vi. quæst. 10). Athens, on similar symbolical grounds, had a sacred fig tree as well as olive tree. In Scripture, especially, the fig tree appears as a symbol of holy peace, as the prophet Micah says (ch. iv. 4): "They shall sit every man under his vine and fig-tree, and none shall make them afraid." So Jotham makes the fig tree say suggestively: Have I then — Israel — lost the possibility of sitting in the peace of God? Was there not an abundance of rest and happiness during forty years under Gideon? shall I surrender all that in order to fall into the arbitrariness of sin? For it can act like Shechem only when the peace of God no longer exists; but, in that case, it withers away, like the fig tree rebuked by Christ, and ceases to bring forth fruit.

The same is true of the grape-vine. The oriental vine attains the height of elms and cedars, and affords a grateful shade. Hence it is the widely-diffused symbol of government, as that which gives peace and comfort. "The mountains," says the Psalmist (lxxx. 11), "are covered with the shadow of it." A golden vine canopied the throne of the Persian monarch. Vines of gold were frequently presented to kings in recognition of their sovereignty (cf. my essay, Der Goldene Thron Salomo's, in Wiss. Bericht, i. p. 124). A celebrated golden vine, mention of which is made by Tacitus also, stood in the temple at Jerusalem. The Mishna says of it: At the entrance to the temple porch there stood a golden vine, trained on poles; whenever any one consecrated anything, he consecrated it as "leaf" or "grape." Elieser b. R. Zadok related, that once it was so vast, that 300 priests were necessary to take it away (Mishna, Middot. iii. 8).

The olive tree said that with him God and men were "honored;" the vine expresses the same thing when he speaks of the "joy" which "God and men" find in him. Usually all that is said of wine is, that "it makes glad the heart of man;" it is, however, also over wine, and wine only, that the "blessing of God" is pronounced,<sup>1</sup> and Melchizedek, as "priest of the Most High God," brings "bread and wine" (Gen. xiv. 18). Nevertheless, the phrase "God and men," is probably to be regarded as proverbial, and as signifying that wine cheers all persons, not excepting the highest and noblest. Since the Middle Ages, we [Germans] use the expression Gott und die Welt — God and the world — in a similar manner. Hartmann von Aue (in his Iwein, ver. 262) says: Verlegeniu mæzekeit ist gote und der werlte leit (mouldering idleness is offensive to God and the world).

The transition from the shade-giving vine to the thorn-bush presents us with a very striking contrast. It is indeed in connection with the thorn-bush, that the narrative displays its nicest shading.

While the trees say בְּלִקְחָהּ to the olive tree, and בְּלִקְחָהּ to the fig tree and vine, unusual forms of the imperative which convey, as it seems to me, the idea of a respectful petition, they address the thorn-bush in common style: בְּלִקְחָהּ עֲלֵינוּ. When it comes to calling on the thorn-bush to be king, the respect which was felt for the olive tree and his compeers, has no longer any place. It may also be remarked that the shady vine is often at no great distance from the thorn-bush. Not unfrequently, even at this day, fertile wine-hills in the holy land, rejoicing also in olive and fig trees, are hedged in by thorn-bushes (cf. Rosenmüller, Morgenland, on Prov. xv. 19).

And the thorn-bush said: If you really anoint me king over you. There lies in this the sharpest censure for the trees. The thorn-bush itself can scarcely believe that its election as king is honestly meant (בְּלִקְחָהּ). Equally striking is it, that Jotham makes the thorn-bush speak of the trees as wishing to "anoint" him. Anoint with what? With oil. But the "oil tree" has already refused to be king over such subjects! The idea is: they anoint with oil, the symbol of peace, while they have murder and the opposite of peace in their hearts. — The thorn-bush declares his readiness to give them all he has. They are at liberty to shelter themselves in his shadow. But he gives no protection against the sun, and his branches are full of thorns. In case of disobedience and apostasy, he will cause fire to go forth, and without respect of persons consume all rebels, even the cedars of Lebanon. For these are his only arts and abilities — to prick and to burn. Æsop has a fable (No. 8) which teaches a similar moral, albeit playfully weakened. It treats of the "Fox and the Thorn-bush." The fox, to save himself from falling, lays hold of the thorn-bush, and gets dreadfully torn by the sharp needles. In answer to his outcry, the thorn-bush says: How canst thou hope to lay hold of me, who am accustomed only to lay hold of others.

Jotham's application in ver. 16 forms a perfect parallel to the speech of the thorn-bush in ver. 15. A minute explanation, that the Shechemites are the trees; that the heroes who heretofore benefited Israel (not merely Gideon, nor as the Rabbis think, Othniel and Barak only), correspond to the olive tree and his equals; and that the thorn-bush means Abimelech, is altogether unnecessary. The scene which he delineates, is it not transpiring before him in the valley below? All he needs to do, is to call their attention to the certainty that the threatening of the thorn-bush will be fulfilled on them; for that is yet future.

As the thorn-bush says to the trees, "If you honestly anoint me king," so Jotham, with crushing irony, says to the people: If now you have acted honestly and sincerely in making Abimelech king. The heathen, as well as the worshippers of the true God, believed that good or evil deeds are recompensed by good or evil results. Even when the Persian Oroetes unlawfully murders the tyrant Polycrates, and afterwards perishes himself in a similar manner, Herodotus (iii. 128) remarks: "Thus did the avenging spirits of Polycrates the Samian overtake him." It was maintained that the tyrant Agathocles had perished on the same day in which he had committed his horrible treason against his confederate Ophellias. This belief, prevalent even among heathen, pointed out the most vulnerable side of conscience. Though they turn away from the altar of Jehovah, they will not be able to escape the law of Elohim, who is even now listening to their loud acclamations. If they think — such is the bitter irony of Jotham's indignant heart — that the collective trees (ver. 14, בְּלִקְחָהּ) can mean it honestly, when they anoint a thorn-bush, then they also, perhaps, acted "honestly and sincerely" when they called Abimelech their king, slew the house of the hero who regarded not his own life to save them, and crowned the murderer, the son of the bondwoman. Such "honesty and virtue" will not fail of their appropriate recompense. The words of the thorn-bush will be fulfilled. The sequel will show the reward. Israel will then perceive the enormity of that which in its present state of moral prostration it allows to pass unchallenged. If such a horrible deed can be deemed "good," he repeats — and the repetition marks the intensity of his grief — then may you rejoice in Abimelech, as now down there in the valley you (hypocritically) shout for joy; but if not, then may you experience what it means to have the thorn-bush for king! Then will sin dissolve what sin began; crime will disover what treason bound together. Then will fire from the thorn-bush consume the sinful trees, and fire from the trees the tyrannical king. Thus he spake, and thus they heard. But sin and excitement drowned the voice of conscience. The friendship between them and their king, and the joy they felt in him, were yet young. Israel kept silence, and Jotham, the hero's son, fled to Beer. Where this place lay, cannot be determined. Probably in the south — near the desert, which would afford the fugitive security against Abimelech's persecution. Of Jotham, nothing more is known; but from amidst the tragedy which throws its dark shadows over the house of his father, his discourse sounds forth, an imperishable call to repentance, addressed to the world in the language of the world, and an admonisher to kings and nations of the certainty of retribution.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Abimelech the Fratricide. Gideon doubtless excelled in power all previous Judges; the deliverance wrought out by him surpassed all previous deliverances. This fact perhaps helps to explain the greatness of the shadow that fell upon the land after his death. The story of Abimelech displays before us a terrible contrast to the government of Gideon. It exhibits strength attended by the most abominable lust after power, energy with ungodliness, victorious talents with utter criminality. Such was the contrast offered by Abimelech with the memory of his father, in whom strength was united to humility, energy to piety, and victory to righteousness. The history of Abimelech teaches that sin (1) forgets good deeds; and (2) inspires misdeeds; but also, (3) that one abomination punishes another, even to destruction. If Gideon had not taken a concubine, this misery would not have come upon Israel! Why did he take her, and from Shechem, a city whose character he must have known! Why did he allow her son to be called "My Father is King!" The little weaknesses of a great man, become the great temptations of small men. Against the murderous fury of sin, there is no protection. The true sons of Gideon were peaceable. They were sons of a hero, but not trained to bloodshedding (ch. viii. 20). They had among them the ephod, reminder of Gideon's victory. They were related to Abimelech, related more closely than the Shechemites; for they were his brothers, and brothers by such a father: but it availed them nothing. "Piety," says the great poet (Goethe), "is a close bond, but ungodliness still closer." The hand once lifted up to murder, does not spare its own brothers. Bloodthirstiness beclouds both eye and heart. It makes no distinction. Thus, sin lies lurking at the door, until its victim bids it enter. Abimelech's conduct has found imitators among Christians. The murderous deeds committed since his day, some of them at the bidding of church authorities, lie like a blood-cloud over the face of history. Only the love of Jesus Christ can penetrate through it, with the sunbeam of his reconciliation.

Abimelech was tyrant, and Jotham must flee. The bloody knife reigns and the spirit which speaks in parables and lives in faith is banished. But Abimelech comes to shame, smitten by a desperate woman (ver. 53), while Jotham's parable, like a winged arrow, pierces all fratricides, from Abimelech down to Richard III. of England. While Abimelech, a false king, passed on, burdened by a load of hatred, Jotham spent his life, as befitted a mourner, in a profound quiet. Seb. Schmidt says, that "God knows how to give peace and safety to those who innocently become faint-hearted, although men fail to espouse their righteous causes." Such is the preaching of the word of God concerning the world's condition, (1) when a Gideon reigns; (2) when an Abimelech rules. The government of the faithful is the salvation of all; and likewise sin is the destruction of men, not excepting those who commit it. There is a judgment. God is not mocked.

STARKE: Those are ignoble souls, who seek to reach an office, not through their own gifts and virtues, but through the favor and influence of their friends. — THE SAME: To lift one's self up by unlawful and sinful means, is sure to bring a curse. THE SAME: Good men are all alike in this, that they do what is godly and righteous, because they know well that there is but one godliness and one righteousness. — THE SAME: The unity of bad men can speedily be changed, by the judgment of God, into enmity and mutual destruction. — GERLACH: Jotham stands forth like a warning prophet, who interprets coming events before they occur, and who is at the same time a sign that the Lord has not left the faith of Gideon unrewarded, notwithstanding the terrible judgment that overtakes his house.

[BR. HALL: Those that are most unworthy of honor, are hottest in the chase of it; whilst the consciousness of better deserts bids men sit still, and stay to be either importuned or neglected. There can be no greater sign of unfitness, than vehement suit. It is hard to say whether there be more pride or arrogance in ambition. — THE SAME: The Shechemites are fit brokers for Abimelech: that city which once betrayed itself to utter depopulation, in yielding to the suit of Hamor, now betrays itself and all Israel in yielding to the request of Abimelech. — THE SAME: Natural respects are the most dangerous corrupters of all elections. What hope can there be of worthy superiors in any free people, where nearness of blood carries it from fitness of disposition! Whilst they say, "He is our brother," they are enemies to themselves and Israel. — THE SAME: Who would not now think that Abimelech should find a hell in his breast, after so barbarous and unnatural a massacre? and yet, behold, he is as senseless as the stone upon which the blood of his seventy brethren was spilt. Where ambition hath possessed itself thoroughly of the soul, it turns the heart into steel, and makes it incapable of a conscience. All sins will easily down with the man that is resolved to rise. — HENRY: Way being thus made for Abimelech's election, the men of Shechem proceed to choose him king. God was not consulted, there was no advising with the priest, or with their brethren of any other city or tribe, though it was designed he should rule over Israel. — SCOTT: If parents could foresee their children's sufferings, their joy in them would be often turned into lamentations; we may therefore be thankful that we cannot penetrate futurity, and are reminded to commit those whom we most love into the hands of the Lord, and to attend to our present duty, casting our care upon Him, respecting ourselves and them. — BUSH: The general moral of Jotham's parable is, (1.) That weak and worthless men are ever forward to thrust themselves into power, while the wise and good are more prone to decline it. (2.) That they who unduly affect honor, and they who unjustly confer it, will prove sources of misery to each other. — KITTO: There are indeed legitimate objects of the highest ambition, and of the most exalted aspirations. Crowns and kingdoms lie beneath the feet of him who pursues with steady pace his high career toward the city of the Great King, where he knows there is laid up for him a crown of glory that fadeth not away — a crown of righteousness which the Lord, the righteous Judge, will bestow upon all that love his appearing. — TR.]

CHAPTER IX. 22-30.

22 When [And] Abimelech had [omit: had] reigned [held sway] three years over
 23 Israel, [.] Then [And] God sent an evil spirit between Abimelech and the men [lords] of Shechem; and the men [lords] of Shechem dealt treacherously with 24 Abimelech: That the cruelty [violence] done to the three-score and ten sons of Jerubbaal might come, and their blood be laid upon Abimelech their brother which slew them, and upon the men [lords] of Shechem which aided him [strengthened 25 his hands] in [for] the killing of his brethren. And the men [lords] of Shechem set liers in wait [ambuscades] for<sup>1</sup> him in the top of the mountains, and they 26 robbed all that came along that way by them: and it was told Abimelech. And Gaal the son of Ebed came with his brethren [on an expedition], and went over to [passed over into] Shechem: and the men [lords] of Shechem put their confidence 27 in him. And they went out into the fields, and gathered their vineyards [held vintage], and trode the grapes, and made merry [prepared harvest-feasts], and went 28 into the house of their god, and did eat and drink, and cursed Abimelech. And Gaal the son of Ebed said, Who is Abimelech, and who is Shechem, that we should serve him? is not he the [a] son of Jerubbaal? and [is not] Zebul his officer?
 serve the men of Hamor the father of Shechem: for why should we serve him?<sup>2</sup> 29 And would to God this people were under my hand! then would I remove Abim-30 elech. And he said to Abimelech, Increase<sup>3</sup> thine army, and come out. And when [omit: when] Zebul the ruler [prefect] of the city heard the words of Gaal the son of Ebed, [and] his anger was kindled.

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Ver. 22. And Abimelech held sway. The narrator says not, "he reigned" (יָרַד), nor "he ruled" (יָרַד), but יָרַד: Abimelech was nothing but a יָרַד. He is not acknowledged either as a rightful king, or as a military chieftain of Israel: he is only a usurper, whom his adherents have clothed with arrogated power. And though his authority is said to have been "over Israel," this does not mean that it extended over the whole nation. The history shows that his authority did not extend beyond the narrow circle of the mountains of Ephraim. Deference and consideration were doubtless paid him in more extended regions, for these no fait accompli, whether it be good or evil, ever fails to command.

Ver. 23. And God sent an evil spirit. Friendship among the wicked is only a league of vice against others. In itself it cannot stand. Wickedness, says Hesiod, prepares its own punishment. Abimelech, it seems, ruled three years in peace. Plutarch, in his noble treatise on the purposes of the Deity in so often delaying the retribution due to crime, finds the ground of it in the wisdom of Providence, which knows the opportune moment for punishment. Here, as in other passages where he speaks of unholy men, our narrator names the recompensing deity Elohim, not Jehovah. Elohim sends the evil spirit of discord among them; for the undeviating law by which sin punishes itself, is grounded in the very nature of the Deity. It would be the destruction of the justice and truth of the divine government, if worthlessness escaped its recompense. The moral universe is so constituted as to ensure evil fruits to evil deeds. The experience which here presents itself is one of the most common in the history of states and individuals. It is the type of all unnatural conspiracies against right, and of their issue. It is moreover demonstrative of the perfect clearness with which the divine government of the world is apprehended in the Book of Judges, that the falling out of vice with itself, and the stopping up by wickedness of the natural sources of its own advantage, are represented as the action of an evil spirit sent by Elohim.<sup>1</sup> Shechem now seeks to deal with Abimelech, as heretofore it helped him to deal with the sons of Gideon. Treason began, and treason ends, the catastrophe.

Ver. 24. That the violence . . . might come home. The twofold expression of the thought, first by לָכֵן, and then by לָכֵן, serves to give it emphasis. The whole history is related so fully, only to show Israel that there is such a thing as retributive justice, — that sin bears its guilt and punishment. Blood comes home to murderers as guilt. Who did ever experience this more terribly than Israel itself, when it slew Him who was more than Gideon and his sons! That which this narrative exhibits as coming on Abimelech and Shechem in the course of three years, the history of the world, has manifestly fulfilled through centuries on those who cried, "His blood be on us and on our children!" Both are punished, Abimelech and Shechem; for both are equally guilty. So likewise both Jerusalem suffered, and the empire by which Pilate was appointed.

Vers. 25. And they laid ambuscades for him. What it was that gave immediate occasion for discord, is not communicated. But Shechem found that it had deceived itself, in thinking that Abimelech's elevation would make itself the virtual ruler. It had fallen into the hands of an iron despot, against whom the cowardly and pleasure-loving Shechemites did not dare openly to rise. They resorted therefore to underhand stratagems to make him odious. For the robberies committed from places of concealment become perfectly intelligible, and fall moreover into harmonious connection with the expression "רָצְחוּ", they dealt treacherously" (ver. 23), when they are regarded as carried on by the Shechemites, but in such a manner as to make them appear to be ordered or instigated by Abimelech. Through them he had become a murderer; they would now make him seem to be a robber and highwayman. But Abimelech received intelligence of the deception. Henceforth, the peace between them was broken; and people such as are here portrayed, know very well that now it is time to be on their guard against each other.

Vers. 26-28. And Gaal Ben-Ebed came. An adventurer, probably a Shechemite, whose name<sup>1</sup> perhaps already expresses the popular contempt into which the braggart subsequently fell, having come to the city with his followers, the Shechemites thought that in him they had found a party-leader who could protect them against Abimelech. Accordingly, they held their vintage, celebrated their harvest-home with songs of rejoicing (הִלְלִים), and then observed the customary sacrificial banquet in the temple of their god. The narrative seeks to exhibit the dramatic contrast between the present jubilant enjoyment and the approaching terrible issue, the present boldness and the subsequent cowardice, the passing luxury and the impending death and destruction. Such sacrificial feasts, particularly as connected with the temple of the "Covenant-God," were also known elsewhere (cf. Dion. Halicarn. iv. 25, on the "covenant-feast" at Ephesus; cf. K. F. Hermann, R. A. der Griechen, ed. Stark. § 66, 4). Among all nations, says Athenæus (lib. v. p. 192), every meal was referred to God, and He was honored with song and praise. But these feasters in the temple at Shechem had no thought of religion. To them applies what Plutarch says, in the introduction to his Symposium: "when barbarity and immorality betake themselves to wine, the banquet comes to a disastrous end." The fumes of wine make these men rash and thoughtless. That which they had hitherto kept secret, they now divulge. Maledictions against Abimelech make themselves heard. The scene enables us to estimate aright the political wisdom of the Corinthian Tyrant Periander, when he forbade social feasts to his opponents. The speech of the poltroon Gaal is especially remarkable. The episode in which the narrator acquaints us with the divine judgment on Abimelech, affords at the same time a glance into the hidden springs of political life in a city like Shechem.

Let us serve the men of Hamor, the father of Shechem. The apostasy of Israel, after the death of Gideon, in Shechem took the form of a covenant entered into with the remaining heathen. The contrast between heathenism and the religious life of Israel was founded in the existence and the characters of national and local idol gods over against the true God of Israel. The covenant between the heathen and the apostate Israelites in Shechem, found its expression in the election of Abimelech as king, on the ground that on the one hand he was Shechem's brother, and on the other Gideon's son. This covenant now breaks up. The wine-heated Gaal pronounces the word: even Abimelech is still too much of Israel. "By what right," he says, "does Abimelech command our homage? Is he not always still a son of Jerubbaal, the enemy of our god?" The reaction of heathenism must be made complete. Shechem must hold fast to its own ancestors. The families who trace their descent from the heathen Hamor (Gen. xxiv.) i. e. those who desire to banish all Israelitish traditions, must be the masters! The offspring of Hamor, the heathen progenitor, must not serve the descendants of Jacob! When the Tyrant of Sicily<sup>2</sup> sought to throw off the influence of Argos, he expelled from the city the worship of Adrastus, the primitive Argive hero. That was his way of declaring himself independent.

Is he not a son of Jerubbaal? and is not Zebul his overseer? Zebul, who in ver. 30 is called the "prefect of the city," was not of the party who now feasted. He evidently belonged to the Israelites, who, though they had made a covenant with the heathenism of Shechem, were not willing to serve the children of Hamor. He belonged to the upper families of the city; and Gaal in his drunken audacity, discloses the idea that he also must be overthrown, "because Abimelech's tool."

Vers. 29, 30. Verse 29 gives the further speech of Gaal in a very vivid and forcible manner. "O that some one would give this people into my hands! then would I quickly remove Abimelech! That is directed against Zebul. What Gaal means, is, that if he were prefect of the city, as Zebul is, he would make short work with Abimelech.

And he said to Abimelech, Increase thine army, and come out. Gaal does not actually say this to Abimelech, nor does he cause it to be said to him, as many expositors think, for Abimelech hears of it for the first time through Zebul. It is only an animated apostrophe to Abimelech, in which Gaal boastfully challenges Abimelech to

loathe, means loathing, Genetius, Lex.; Ebed, Son of a Slave. Cf. ver. 18, where Jotham speaks of Abimelech as a son of Gideon's bondwoman. — Ta.]

prepare himself as if he were present. The inhabitants of Shechem, between their potations, doubtless applauded Gaal, which had the usual effect of emboldening the wine-heated orator. But this drunken jubilation resulted in the ruin of Shechem; for it reached the ears of Zebul. His anger kindled; for his own overthrow, he learned, was to be connected with that of Abimelech.

The narrative, in its admirable simplicity, allows us clearly to trace the advancing progress of that fatal destiny, in which secret treachery and open dissipation, boasting and jealousy, conspire together to precipitate a righteous doom upon the city.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

[BP. HALL: The prosperity of the wicked is but short and fickle. A stolen crown, though it may look fair, cannot be made of any but brittle stuff. All life is uncertain; but wickedness overruns nature. — THE SAME: It had been pity that the Shechemites should have been plagued by any other hand than Abimelech's. They raised him unjustly to the throne; they are the first that feel the weight of his sceptre. The foolish bird limes herself with that which grew from her own excretion. Who wonders to see the kind peasant stung with his own snake? — THE SAME: How could Abimelech hope for fidelity of them, whom he had made and found traitors to his father's blood? No man knows how to be sure of him that is unconscionable. He that hath been unfaithful to one, knows the way to be perfidious, and is only fit for his trust that is worthy to be deceived; whereas faithfulness, beside the present good, lays a ground of further assurance. The friendship that is begun in evil cannot stand: wickedness, both of its own nature and through the curse of God, is ever unsteady. — THE SAME: If the men of Shechem had abandoned their false god with their false king, and out of a serious remorse and desire of satisfaction for their idolatry and blood, had opposed this tyrant, and preferred Jotham to his throne, there might have been both warrant for their quarrel, and hope of success; but now, if Abimelech be a wicked usurper, yet the Shechemites are idolatrous traitors. — THE SAME: When the quarrel is betwixt God and Satan, there is no doubt of the issue; but when one devil fights with another, what certainty is there of the victory? — TR.]

CHAPTER IX. 31-41.

- 31 And he sent messengers unto Abimelech privily, saying, Behold, Gaal the son of Ebed, and his brethren, be come to Shechem; and behold, they fortify [excite] the city against thee. Now therefore up by night, thou, and the people that is with thee, and lie in wait in the field: And it shall be, that in the morning, as soon as the sun is up, thou shalt rise early, and set [move] upon the city; and behold, when [omit: when] he and the people that is with him [will] come out against [to] thee, [and] then mayest [shalt] thou do to them as thou shalt find occasion.
- 34 And Abimelech rose up, and all the people that were with him, by night, and they laid wait against [near] Shechem in four companies. And Gaal the son of Ebed went out, and stood in the entering [at the entrance] of the gate of the city: and [10:] Abimelech rose up, and the people that were with him, from lying in wait
- 36 [from their place of ambush]. And when [omit: when] Gaal saw the people, [and] he said to Zebul, Behold, there come people down from the top [tops] of the mountains. And Zebul said unto him, Thou seest the shadow of the mountains as if
- 37 they were men. And Gaal spake again, and said, See, there [also] come people down by the middle [from the height] of the land, and another [one] company come along by the plain of Meonenim [cometh from the way of the Magicians' Grove].
- 38 Then said Zebul unto him, Where is now thy mouth, wherewith thou saidst, Who is Abimelech, that we should serve him? is not this the people that thou hast despised? go out, I pray now, and fight with them. And Gaal went out before [at
- 40 the head of] the men [lords] of Shechem, and fought with Abimelech. And Abimelech chased him, and he fled before him, and many were overthrown and wounded
- 41 [many fell slain], even unto the entering [entrance] of the gate. And Abimelech dwelt [remained] at Arumah: and Zebul thrust out Gaal and his brethren, that they should not dwell in Shechem.

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Ver. 31. And he sent secretly, בְּחֵסֶה. Although the form תִּרְמִיָה (cf. תִּרְמִיָּית) is an unusual one, the connection suggests, not the name of a place, but the fact that Zebul, though "prefect of the city," concealed his measure from the citizens. The messengers whom he sent must have gone "secretly" (as the Sept. and Targum translate), since Gaal had not learned of their going (ver. 36). How were such intercourse, as ver. 36 implies, possible between Zebul and Gaal, if Zebul's cooperation with Abimelech against Gaal had been publicly known? Nor is Zebul to be regarded as one of Abimelech's generals, but as a Shechemite magistrate, who is incensed because Gaal plots his own overthrow. It may be confidently assumed that if בְּתִרְמָה were the name of a place, ver. 34 would read: "And Abimelech rose up; בְּתִרְמָה, from Tormah." בְּתִרְמָה, however, conveys not only the idea of secrecy, but of secrecy combined with deceit, secret deceit; and such was certainly the character of Zebul's act.<sup>1</sup> It is also to be noticed that in his me sage Zebul does not accuse the city, but only Gaal as exciting the city against Abimelech. As magistrate, he does not wish to bring the wrath of Abimelech upon the city, but only upon his rival. Very graphic is the expression בְּתִרְמָה, commonly used of besiegers. Gaal and his brethren, says Zebul, press the city like besiegers, to induce it to rise against thee. Their expulsion is therefore all that is necessary. But since this is not the whole truth—for Shechem, as we have seen, first elected Gaal because it had already offended against Abimelech—it is evident that Zebul's policy of exciting Abimelech against Gaal only, is dictated by regard to his own interests.

Vers. 32-41. And move upon the city. The place of Abimelech's abode is not given; but he was in the midst of his army. He must have been some distance from Shechem, since he needed a part of the night (ver. 32) to get within easy reach of it. He is to place himself in ambush, so as not to be prematurely observed. Abimelech follows the counsel. In the morning, Gaal and Zebul naturally betake themselves to the gate of the city: Gaal, because it had become his business to watch over Shechem; Zebul, because of his office as magistrate. Gaal, who has no misgivings—for he has slept away the effects of the wine—sees troops descending from the mountains. Zebul thinks it yet too soon to tell him the truth; he will give Abimelech time first to bring up all his forces; and therefore deceives and at the same time mocks

Gaal by saying, "It is the shadow of the mountains that thou seest." Immediately, however, a body of troops is seen advancing whose identity as such cannot be mistaken. By the "tops of the mountains" we are to understand the more distant mountains; by the "height (רֶמֶס) of the land," a nearer hill, in the immediate vicinity of the city (the "navel" of the land); and by the "Elon Meonenim," a dusky forest ("Magicians' Grove"), against the near horizon. From all these points, commanding the avenues to the city, troops of soldiers advanced, to the consternation of Gaal and the surprise of the citizens. Now Zebul throws off his mask, and reminds Gaal of his previous audacity. The latter is compelled to try his fortunes in battle. At the head of the "lords of Shechem," he marches out against Abimelech. But he is far from being a match for him. He is utterly unable to stand his ground. A terrible rout begins. Gaal saves himself through the open gate; but the road, up to the very threshold of the gate, is covered with the slain. His boasting has a miserable end. His authority is gone. Zebul, who previously did not dare insist on his expulsion, now carries it through. He persuades the timid and terrified Shechemites that they will thus allay the anger of Abimelech. He believes it himself; for he has carefully thrown the whole blame on Gaal. Abimelech's conduct seems to favor this persuasion; for he does not prosecute the attack, but retires to Arumah.<sup>2</sup> But what a delusion! The banished Gaal is the only one who escapes destruction.

HOMEILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

[Bp. HALL: Never any man was so ill, as not to have some favorers: Abimelech hath a Zebul in the midst of Shechem. Lightly all treasons are betrayed, even with some of their own.—HENRY: Proud and haughty people are often made, in a little time, to dread those whom they had most despised. Justly are the insolent thus insulted over.—THE SAME: Most people judge of men's fitness for business by their success, and he that does not speed well, is concluded not to do well. Gaal's interest in Shechem is soon at an end, nor do we ever hear of him any more.—TR.]

CHAPTER IX. 42-57.

42 And it came to pass on the morrow, that the people went out into the field; and 43 they told Abimelech. And he took the [i. e. his] people, and divided them into three companies, and laid wait in the field, and looked, and behold, the people were come [coming] forth out of the city; and he rose up against them, and smote them.

44 And Abimelech, and the company [companies] that was [were] with him, rushed forward,<sup>1</sup> and stood [placed themselves] in the entering [at the entrance] of the gate of the city: and the two other companies ran [advanced] upon all the people

45 that were in the fields, and slew them. And Abimelech fought against the city all that day; and he took the city, and slew the people that was therein, and beat

46 [tore] down the city, and sowed it with salt. And when all the men [lords] of the tower of Shechem heard that, they entered into an [the] hold<sup>2</sup> of the house of the

47 god Berith [house of El-Berith]. And it was told Abimelech, that all the men

48 [lords] of the tower of Shechem were gathered together [there]. And Abimelech gat him up to Mount Zalmon, he and all the people that were with him; and Abimelech took an axe in his hand, and cut down a bough from the trees, and took it [lifted it up], and laid it on his shoulder, and said unto the people that were with

49 him, What ye have seen me do, make haste, and do as I have done. And all the people likewise cut down [off] every man his bough, and followed Abimelech, and put them to the hold, and set the hold on fire upon<sup>3</sup> them: so that [and] all the

50 men of the tower of Shechem died also, about a thousand men and women. Then went Abimelech to Thebez, and encamped against [laid siege to] Thebez, and took it.

51 But there was a strong tower within [in the midst of] the city, and thither fled all the men and women, and all they [the lords] of the city, and shut it to [after] them,

52 and gat them up to the top [roof] of the tower. And Abimelech came unto the tower, and fought against it, and went hard [approached] unto the door of the tower

53 to burn it with fire. And a certain woman cast a piece of a [cast an upper] millstone upon Abimelech's head, and all to [omit: all to]<sup>4</sup> brake his skull<sup>5</sup> [to pieces].

54 Then he called hastily unto the young man his armour-bearer, and said unto him, Draw thy sword, and slay me [put me to death], that men say not of me, A woman

55 slew him. And his young man thrust him through, and he died. And when the men of Israel saw that Abimelech was dead, they departed every man unto his

56 place. Thus God rendered [caused to return] the wickedness of Abimelech, which 57 he did unto his father, in slaying his seventy brethren: And all the evil of the men of Shechem did God render [cause to return] upon their heads: and upon them came the curse of Jotham the son of Jerubbaal.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 44. —  $\text{וַיִּפְּצוּ}$ : spread out, sc. in hostile array. The same word occurs ver. 33; and in both places seems to contrast the expanded form of a body of men freely advancing, with its contraction when lying in an bush. The verse is somewhat difficult. Dr. Cassel renders it as follows: "And Abimelech and the companies that were with him, spread themselves out. Part stood [took their stand] at the entrance of the gate of the city, and two companies threw themselves on all that were in the field, and slew them." — Ta.]

[2 Ver. 46. —  $\text{וַיִּבְנוּ}$ . The meaning of this word is doubtful. Our author renders it Halls; De Wette, Feste, stronghold; Keil suggests Zwinger (cf. arx, from arceo), citadel, fortress; while according to Bertheau, ver. 49 (where he would render: and they put the boughs on the  $\text{וַיִּבְנוּ}$ , and infer thence that the place bearing this name was low), "rather implies a cellar-like place, some sort of hollow." Cf. 1 Sam. xiii. 6, the only other passage where the word occurs, and where it is conjoined with caves and clefts of the rocks." — Ta.]

[3 Ver. 49. —  $\text{וַיִּבְנוּ$ : Cassel, "with them," i. e. the boughs. But this rendering will scarcely find favor. De Wette: "over them," i. e. the people in the  $\text{וַיִּבְנוּ}$ . — Ta.]

[4 Ver. 53. — "All to brake," is old English for "entirely brake." Cf. Webster, Dict., under "all," adv. — Ta.]

[5 Ver. 53. —  $\text{וַיִּבְנוּ}$ , from  $\text{וַיִּבְנוּ}$ , is undoubtedly to be read  $\text{וַיִּבְנוּ}$ , which reading, according to Bertheau and Keil, is found in the edition of R. Nord, Mantua, 1742-44. — Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Vers. 42-44. The people went out into the field. Sin is blind, and must be, for only repentance opens the eyes. The people of Shechem, notwithstanding their treasurable practices, actually think that the matter is now settled, and that Abimelech is content with the banishment of Gaal. It is a constant characteristic of the natural man, that he either does not hear his conscience, or seeks to silence it by persuading himself that the guilt to which he shuts his own eyes is also unseen by others. He thinks only of sin and its pleasure, not of its punishment. The Shechemites have forgotten, to their own hurt, what Jotham told them. The thorn-bush emits fire, and consumes those who despise it. Abimelech only tarries in his concealed height, until he has inspired the foolish Shechemites with confidence. With true Punic strategy, he allures them to the open fields, there to attend to their labor, as if all were peace, and nothing more were to be feared. Caught in the snare, their retreat is cut off. One of Abimelech's companies holds the gate, while others deal destruction to all in the fields. Similar strategies are told of Hamilcar, the Carthaginian, against Agrigentum, and of Hannibal against Saguntum (Frontinus, lib. iii. 10, 1).

Vers. 45. He destroyed the city and sowed it with salt. Notwithstanding Abimelech's sanguinary disposition, it would be difficult to account for his savage treatment of Shechem, if we did not remember that the city stood in the covenant of Baal-berith with him. The very money that assisted him to the throne, had been taken from the temple of this god. Now, among oriental nations, as among others, infidelity to covenant obligations was the greatest of crimes. The God of Israel, also, who made his divine covenant with the nation, says (Deut. iv. 23): "Take heed unto yourselves, lest ye forget the covenant of Jehovah your God, which he made with you. For Jehovah your God is a consuming fire, a jealous God." He utters the threat (Lev. xxvi. 25): "I will bring the sword upon you, that shall avenge the quarrel of my covenant." In the book of the prophet Ezekiel (ch. xvii. 15) we read: "He hath broken the covenant, and shall he be delivered?"

This covenant with Jehovah, Abimelech has desecrated in the most horrible manner. Does he fear no punishment for that transgression? But the natural man, who lightly breaks the covenant of his God, nevertheless claims the terrible right of punishing those who have failed in duty toward himself, with a severity greater than that threatened by God. The breach of a covenant born of blood and sin, is visited with vengeance like a "consuming fire." Shechem is razed to the ground, and salt is strewn over its site. The usual explanation of this proceeding, of which no other instance occurs,<sup>1</sup> is, that by it Abimelech intends to declare Shechem an unfruitful land, a land of salt, as it were (מלח). But this explanation, although accepted by all recent expositors, does not appear to be satisfactory. For to make the land unfruitful, he neither intends, nor, if he did, were he able; for no one will think of such a salting as would actually bring about this result.<sup>2</sup> He can only intend to say, that this city, being unfaithful to its covenants, and forgetful of its oaths, has ceased to exist, and is never more to be known as a city. When Joshua inflicted a similar destruction on Jericho, he swore that it should never be rebuilt (Josh. vi. 26). Abimelech makes the same declaration in the act of strewing salt; for salt is the symbol of an oath, just as among all nations, not excepting the dull tribes of Siberia, it was the symbol of covenants. The salt which he strewed over Shechem intimated both the cause and the perpetuity of the vengeance inflicted. A fate still worse, but less deserved, was suffered by the descendants of the Milesian Branchidæ who had betrayed the treasures of the temple of Apollo, at Didymi, into the hands of Xerxes, and had obtained through him a city in Persia. Alexander, coming upon this city, gave it up to the vengeance of the Milesians in his army. These destroyed it to its very foundations, killed all the inhabitants, so that not a trace of them remained, and tore up the groves by their roots, so that, as Curtius says (vii. 5, 34), "vasta solitudo et sterilis humus linqvitur." Shechem's destruction was not so bad as that: and it was afterwards rebuilt (1 Kgs. xii. 25).

Vers. 46-49. And the lords of the Tower of Shechem heard of it. Still more cowardly than that of the Shechemites, is the conduct of the men of the Tower of Shechem. They venture no resistance at all, but run for safety to the temple-asylum of El-Berith. The House of El, here mentioned, cannot well be the same with the House of Baal hitherto spoken of. The matter probably stands thus: Under the covenant entered into by Israel and the heathen, both parties served the Covenant-Deity, the Israelites in the temple of El-Berith, the heathen in that of Baal-Berith. Aside from this difference of locality, the worship was perhaps identical; and the covenant itself was already a sin. It would however be an error, to suppose that during such times of apostasy all distinction between Israel and the heathen ceased to exist. Abimelech still continued to be an Israelite; and the inhabitants of the Tower of Shechem probably expected to find greater security in the House of El-Berith than could be looked for in the asylum of a wholly heathen temple. The place to which they retired, is called בֵּית־אֵל, and is probably a hall of the temple* (like בֵּית־אֵל, used to denote a special part of the temple at Jerusa'em). The sanctuary privileges of temples were very great among all nations; and, as is well known with reference to the temple at Ephesus, were not seldom misused. In order to destroy Pausanias without violating the rights of sanctuary, the doors of the temple of Minerva, at Sparta, in which he had taken refuge, were built up, and the roof taken off "that under the open sky he might more quickly perish" (Corn. Nepos, Paus. ch. 5). Abimelech resorted to more terrible means. He ascended the neighboring wooded hill, Mount Zalmon—so named from its forest-shades,—and hewed off a multitude of boughs, himself being the first to swing the axe.

(The plural, בֵּית־אֵל, stands for all the axes that were used.) These boughs were piled up about the building, and all its inmates perished in the flames. A like deed is related by Herodotus (iv. 164) of Arcesilaus: a number of Cyrenæans having taken refuge in a tower, he heaped wood around it, and burned them to death. It is a species of violence which, especially among the northern nations, has been practiced oftener than Kell, Bush) that the act was designed symbolically to turn the city into a salt-desert. Our author's explanation does not conflict with that of his predecessors, but rather completes it. — Ta.]

* The extent of the temple building which this implies is not unparalleled. The temple of Diana in Samos was so large as to afford sanctuary to the 300 Corycæan boys whom Periander dispatched to Alyattes, king of Lydia, for eunuchs, and yet leave room for choirs of Samian youth to execute certain religious dances before them, ingeniously invented as a means of conveying food to them (Herod. iii. 48).

<sup>1</sup> [In Scripture, the author means, of course. The following instances in comparatively recent times, probably mere imitations of what from this passage is usually assumed to have been an ancient custom, are noted by Wordsworth: "When Milan was taken in A. D. 1162, it was sown with salt (Signonius); and the house of Admiral Colligny, murdered in the massacre of St. Bartholomew, A. D. 1572, was, by the command of Charles IX., king of France, sown with salt." — Ta.]

<sup>2</sup> [Wordsworth does however: "Sowed it with salt, to destroy its fertility, and to make it barren for ever, like Sodom, comp. Pliny, xxxi. 7." But this idea is not at all necessary to the common explanation (as given by Bertheau, once, — as, for instance, by king Olaf (Tryggvesson), who burned in this manner all the warlocks of his land (Snorro, Heingskringla, Saga vi. ch. 69).

In connection with these events, a number of topographical references to the region of Shechem, which prove that the narrator was an eye-witness, but which although alluding to permanent landmarks, as mountain, valley, and forest, are yet not easily traced. Migdal (Tower of) Shechem, however, may be confidently assumed to be the same as Beth (House of) Millo (vers. 6, 20). Abimelech's wrath against it is thus readily understood; for its inhabitants had taken part in his election at the Monument-Oak, and had now doubtless made common cause with those of Lower Shechem. For it is perhaps safe to assume that the places were related to each other as Upper and Lower Shechem. Migdal Shechem, as the Acropolis, was a little city by itself, and might have ventured on further resistance; but its people preferred to pray for mercy, which Abimelech was not the man to exercise.

Vers. 50-53. And Abimelech went to Thebez. Since the course of the narrative leads to the inference that Abimelech's march upon this city formed part of his vengeance on Shechem, its location must be sought for at a very short distance from that place. The opinion of recent expositors and travellers (Robinson, Berggren, cf. Ritter, xv. 448 [Gage's Transl. ii. 341]), who identify Thebez with the modern Tubās at the head of Wady el-Malih, does not therefore appear to be altogether certain. To me, Tubās has appeared more suitable for Tabbath (ch. vii. 22). Thebez must have been closely connected with Shechem. Since, in accordance with Jotham's parable, the two miserable associates, Abimelech and Shechem, perish by each other, and since Abimelech finds his end at Thebez, the inhabitants of the latter must have been among those who at first patronized Abimelech. Thebez was built in circular form, like the Grecian Thebe, for it had its Tower in the centre. Its inhabitants preferred desperate battle to mercy; but they were already on the verge of destruction, when Abimelech ("inter confertissimos violentissime dimicans," fighting furiously in the thickest of the crowd, as Justin says of Pyrrhus) was struck on the head by a mill-stone, which crushed his skull. It appears that the inhabitants of Thebez were prepared for a lengthy siege, since along with provisions they had also brought a hand-mill into the tower. Such a mill consisted of a movable upper (רָכָב, wagon, Eng. runner, Germ. Läufer), and of an immovable, nether stone (פֶּלֶא הַחֲמִיתָ), on which the other turned. The duty of grinding generally devolved on women. Abimelech falls, as the Jewish expositors say, by a stone, as on a stone he had murdered his brothers. Other usurpers also have met with the same fate. When in 1190, impious men sought to destroy the poor Jews, who had taken refuge in the royal castle at York, one of the ringleaders of the mob fell, crushed by a stone (Milman, Hist. of the Jews, iii. 242).

Ver. 54. That men say not, A woman slew him. Poor Abimelech, in the moment of his fall, thinks of nothing save that his death will be ascribed to a woman; an end which has at all times been considered inglorious. To his latest breath, men were to be deceived by appearances. For though his attendant gave him the finishing stroke, it was nevertheless the woman that killed him. And, as 2 Sam. xi. 21 shows, he was not able to avert the dreaded infamy. Still, this utterance also goes to show the warlike spirit of the fallen man. Energy, valor, and iron strength, were inherited characteristics of the son, not unworthy of his heroic father. He towers, at all events, far above the cowardly Shechemites, the braggart Gaal, and the intriguing Zebul. If ambition and unrestrained fury had not stupefied his conscience; if, like Gideon, he had learned to serve and to suffer; had faithfully tarried the call of his God, and had not sought to found by the sword what only God's Spirit can establish, it might have been said of him, as of the noblest: "he judged, delivered his people." As it was, he is never even named by the title "King" which he arrogated to himself; and Jewish tradition exalts the heathen king Abimelech of Abraham's time, above the valiant son of Gideon.

Vers. 55-57. When the men of Israel saw that Abimelech was dead. In Abimelech's death, also, we may read the fate of tyrants. His attendant thrusts him through without hesitation, and the dead chieftain is forsaken by all. The interest created by his person and his wages, is gone. How much more beautiful is the otherwise so tragical death of Saul! His attendant, influenced by reverence, refused to kill him, and finally follows him in voluntary death. The songs of David celebrate his memory: Abimelech's epitaph, is his brother Jotham's curse!

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Compare on p. 147.

[BP. HALL: O the just successions of the revenges of God! Gideon's ephod is punished with the blood of his sons; the blood of his sons is shed by the procurement of the Shechemites; the blood of the Shechemites is shed by Abimelech; the blood of Abimelech is spilt by a woman. The retaliations of God are sure and just. — THE SAME: The pursued Shechemites fly to the house of their god Berith: now they are safe; that place is at once a fort and a sanctuary. Whither should we fly in our distress, but to our God? And now this refuge shall teach them what a god they have served. — THE SAME: Now, according to the prophecy of Jotham, a fire goes out of the bramble, and consumes these cedars, and their eternal flames begin in the house of their Berith. The confusion of wicked men rises out of the false deities which they have doted on. — HENRY. What inventions men have to destroy one another! — THE SAME: About 1,000 men and women perished in these flames, many of whom, probably, were no way concerned in the quarrel, nor meddled with either side; men of factious turbulent spirits, perish not alone in their iniquity, but involve many more, that follow them in their simplicity, in the same calamity with them. — WORDSWORTH: Many powerful enemies of God and of his people, after victorious acts of oppression, have been overthrown at last by weak instruments, even by women: Sisera, by Deborah and Jael; Haman, by Esther; Holofernes, by Judith; and the Church, by the power of the Seed, overcomes the world. — BUSH: The end of Abimelech suggests the remark, 1. That they who thirst for blood, God will at last give them their own blood to drink. 2. The weak, in God's hand, can confound the mighty; and those who walk in pride, He is able to abase. 3. They who in life consulted only their pride and ambition, will usually die as they lived, more solicitous that their honor should be preserved on earth, than that their souls be saved from hell. (4.) The methods proud men take to se-

SIXTH SECTION.

The Judgeships of Tola and Jair.

CHAPTER X. 1-5.

- 1 And after Abimelech there arose to defend [deliver] Israel, Tola the son of Puah, the son of Dodo, a man of Issachar; and he dwelt in Shamir in mount Ephraim.
- 2 And he judged Israel twenty and three years, and died, and was buried in Shamir.
- 3 And after him arose Jair, a [the] Gileadite, and judged Israel twenty and two years.
- 4 And he had thirty sons [,] that rode on thirty ass colts, and they had thirty cities, [those] which are called Havoth-jair [the circles of Jair] unto this day, which are in
- 5 the land of Gilead. And Jair died, and was buried in Camon.

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Ver. 1. And after Abimelech there arose Tola, the son of Puah, the son of Dodo. The record of this man's life contains no stirring actions, like those of Abimelech, but tells of something better. He "delivered" and "judged" Israel. This, however, always presupposes renewed consciousness of sin on the part of Israel, and return to the living God. It is probable that the horrible deeds and the terrible end of Abimelech and Shechem made such an impression upon the conscience of Israel, as to open the way for deliverance. Under this view, the words "after Abimelech" receive a deeper significance; and the reason why the history of that personage was so copiously narrated becomes still more evident. That which at other times was the result of terrors from without, is this time brought about by the civil catastrophe within.

The deliverer's name was "Tola, the son of Puah, the son of Dodo." The mention of father and grandfather both, is unusual, and occurs in the case of no other Judge. It was therefore natural, that already at an early date, and also, it would seem, by the Masora, "ben Dodo" was taken appellatively, as meaning "Son of his Uncle or Cousin." The "his" in that case must refer to Abimelech; and Tola would have to be regarded as the son of a brother or a sister of Gideon. The son of Gideon's brother, he cannot have been (although this is just the relation indicated by ancient expositions, cf. the καταδελφον of the LXX.); for he belonged not to Manasseh, but to Issachar. If a sister of Gideon had married a man of the tribe of Issachar, this person might indeed have been called an uncle (dod) of Abimelech. But if such were the relation, is it not more likely that the writer would have said, "Son of the sister of Jerubbaal?" The names Tola and Puah, as borne by sons of Issachar, are already found in Gen. xlii. 13. They became established in the families of that tribe, and frequently recur. It was just so in German families, especially of the Middle Ages. Particular names were peculiar to particular families. (Instead of פּוּחַ, Puah, we have פּוּבָּה, Puvah, in Gen. xlii. 13 and Num. xxvi. 23, though not in all MSS. 1 Chr. vii. 1 has פּוּחַ, Puah.) These names indicate a certain industry, which, it may be inferred, must have been carried on in Issachar. Tola (תּוֹלָעַ) is the Kermes-worm (coccus ilicis), from which the crimson, or deep scarlet color (תִּינִינֶצֶר שָׁנִי), of which we read so much in connection with the tabernacle, was derived; and Puah is Chaldee for rubia tinctorum, or madder red (cf. Buxtorff, sub voce). We shall not err, perhaps, if we conjecture that the third name also is added because of its agreement in meaning with the two preceding. For Dodo, if we derive it from דֹּד, dud, instead of דֹּד, dod, cousin, means "pot," or "vessel," a prominent utensil in the preparation of dyes.<sup>1</sup> Names of this kind, it is well known, are not unfrequent in the East. Hammer (Namen der Araber) even adduces the name Führ, which signifies the stone used for grinding perfumes.

He dwelt in Shamir, on Mount Ephraim. The centre of his judicial activity was permanently fixed in Ephraim. As to Shamir, this name (on its import, compare my treatise Schamir, Erf. 1856) may be identified with Shemer, name of the owner of the hill on which King Omri afterwards built Shomeron, Samaria (1 Kgs. xvi. 24).

Vers. 3-5. And after him arose Jair, the Wilde, Voyage in the Mediterranean, Dublin, 1840, II 148 ff. quoted by Bitter, xvii. 372.

Gileadite. Just as Tola was a family-name in Issachar, so was Jair in Gilead. The ancestor of this Jair was the son of Manasseh, whose name was associated with the acquisition of the greatest part of the territory in possession of the eastern half-tribe of Manasseh. Machir, it is stated, Num. xxxii. 39-41, took Gilead, and "Jair, son of Manasseh," the "circles," which were afterwards called the "circles of Jair." It has already been pointed out in connection with our explanation of the name Hivie (Chivi), that chavah, (plur. chapoth, Eng. Ver. Havoth), means "circle," from the form in which those villages to which it is applied were laid out (see on ch. iii. 3). It would, therefore, involve a twofold error to explain Havoth-Jair, as modern expositors do, by making it analogous to such German names as Eisleben and Ascherleben; for, in the first place, chavah does not mean "life" here; and, secondly, in such names as the above, the German leben does not mean vita but mansio.

By these "circles of Jair" we are evidently to understand the whole of the present western Hauran, reaching as far as Jebel Hauran, for Kenath (the present Kenawath) is reckoned among the sixty cities of Jair (1 Chr. ii. 23; 1 Kgs. iv. 13). Wetzstein's conjecture (Hauran, p. 101), that these cities are only sixty tent-villages of the nomadic order, is by no means to be accepted; for the books of Kings and Chronicles are conversant with great cities, with walls and brazen bars, in the region that "pertained to Jair." The objection that if such cities had existed, the Assyrians could not have subjected the two and a half tribes so readily, is not borne out. In the first place, because the accounts of this conquest are very brief and scanty; and in the second place, because the history of all ages teaches us, that when the Spirit has left a people, neither fortresses nor "steep heights" avail to detain the enemy. At all events, the Assyrian successes do not prove that the architectural remains of the Hauran cannot in their elements be referred back to the time of the Amorites and Israelites. Without at present entering into any discussion of this subject, we hold the contrary to be highly probable, even though, at the places which would here come into consideration, more recent buildings bear the stamp of more recent times. Indeed, it seems to me, that just as it was possible to identify Kenath, Salcah, Golan, etc., so the name Jair also is in existence to this day. I find it in the name of the city called "Aere" by Burckhardt, "Eera" by Seetzen, and "Ire" by Wetzstein. It is still the seat of an influential (Druse) chieftain. Ritter (xv. 944) warns us against confounding it with the Aera which the Itinerary of Antonine puts in the place of the present Szanamein; but it were more proper to say that the repeated occurrence of the name, should be regarded as evidence that the whole region was once called "Jair's circles."

The narrator's remark that the cities of Jair "are called Havoth Jair unto this day," has been supposed to conflict with the statement of the Pentateuch, wherein this name is derived from the first Jair (cf. Hengst., Pent. ii. 193). With regard to some other names of places, such an exchange of one derivation for another, may perhaps be made out; but here it is quite impossible that one should have taken place. The narrator, who keeps the Pentateuch constantly before his eyes, designs only to remind the reader of what was there stated. In themselves, his words would have been entirely insufficient to explain the origin of the designation Havoth-Jair, seeing the discourse was about "cities"

(עִירִים). Moreover, the number of these cities, at a later date, was reckoned at sixty, whereas here mention is made of only thirty. The sentence is indeed peculiar on account of the double לָהֶם; for which reason a few codices read it but once. But the word does not bear the same sense in both cases. The second לָהֶם, introduces an explanatory clause; so that the meaning of the sentence is this: "thirty cities belonged to them (לָהֶם), of those (לָהֶם)<sup>1</sup> which (the relative הַנֵּשֶׁר is frequently omitted) are called Havoth-Jair unto this day." The closing words of this sentence ("unto this day") are evidently a mere verbal citation from Deut. iii. 14; for no other occasion exists here, where the question is only of Jair's distinguished position, for their use. Jair, by his strength and virtue, had diffused his family over one half of the entire district, with which his ancient progenitor had long ago associated his own name.

And he had thirty sons, who rode on thirty asses, and had thirty cities. The paronomasia between עִירִים, asses, and the rare form עִירִים for "cities," authorizes the conjecture that we have here a sentence from a song of praise in honor of Jair and his prosperous fortune. That which is celebrated is, not that he possessed thirty asses — what would that be to a man who had thirty cities? — but that he was the father of thirty sons, all of whom enjoyed the honor and distinction implied in the statement that they rode upon asses. They rode, that is to say, not merely as men of quality — the usual explanation, — but as chiefs, governors, and judges. It was peculiar to such persons especially that they made use of the ass, as the animal of peace. Their very appearance on this animal, was expressive of their calling to reconcile and pacify. The sons of Jairs judged their thirty cities. This is something not given to all rich fathers; it was a happiness which not even Samuel the Priest was destined to enjoy.

Jair was buried in Camon, doubtless one of the thirty cities of Hauran. The farther and more thorough investigation is carried in the country east of the Jordan, the more instructive will its results become. Perhaps we may take the Sahwed el-Kamh, on Wetzstein's map, not far from Ire (Jair), for the Camon of the text. However little may be told of many of the Judges of Israel, of their place of burial information is given. The whole land was to be, as it were, a memorial hall, by which the people are reminded of the men who brought help in distress, when they repented, and which may also teach them to know that all men,

<sup>1</sup> [In the text, Dr. Cassel renders לָהֶם by "those," while here he writes "of those." The first rendering may be defended, but the second is as doubtful as it is unnecessary. If the intention be to avoid all appearance of conflict with the Pentateuch, this is just as effectually reached by the unimpeachable version of De Wette: Man nennet sie Jair's Dörfer bis auf diesen Tag — they are called Jair's

Villages unto this day. הַנֵּשֶׁר is the indeterminate 3d per. plural, and (as is remarked by Bertheau and Kell) does not at all affirm that the name was now first given. לָהֶם is the dative of that to which the name is given, and stands first for the sake of emphasis; "they had thirty cities; precisely those cities people call Havoth-Jair." — Ta.]

however valiant, die, and that only the one, eternal God survives in deathless existence. But how inadequate monuments and sepulchres are to preserve energy and piety among the people, that the following section once more teaches.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Two judges in times of quiet. After the terrible storm, comes a calm. For half a century Tola and Jair judge Israel, without committing frightful wrongs, or performing enviable deeds. The greatness of Gideon's times, and the baseness of Abimelech's, are both exhausted. An unknown, but happy, generation lives and works in peace under pious Judges. No enemy threatens, the word of God is quick and active, the country prospers, commerce flourishes. A quiet life is rich in seeds. Amid the silence of repose, the germs of spring prepare themselves. It is a type of the Kingdom in the future, when through the eternal calm only the anthems of adoring choirs will be heard, like the voices of nightingales resounding through the night.

So, it is not given to every one to live a quiet, peaceful life, undisturbed by political and social alarms. Let him who enjoys it, not envy the fame with which publicity surrounds great names. In quietness and confidence shall be your strength, says the prophet (Isa. xxx. 15).

STARKE: To govern a nation well in times of peace, is not less praiseworthy than to carry on wars and overcome enemies. — LISCO: Tola saved his people, not indeed by wars and victims, but by right and justice, by the concord and peace which he restored in Israel.

[SCOTT: The removal of hardened sinners, by a righteous God, often makes way for reformation and public tranquillity, and proves a great mercy to those who survive. — WORDSWORTH: The time in which they [i. e. Tola, Jair, Ibzan, Elon, and Abdon] judged Israel amounted to seventy years, but the Holy Spirit does not record a single act done by any one of them; and thus He leads us to look forward and upward to another life, and to that heavenly chronicle which is written with indelible characters in the memory of God Himself, and is ever open to his divine eye. — TR.]

THE OPPRESSION OF THE MIDIANITES. JEPHTHAH, THE JUDGE OF THE YOW.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 8. — Dr. Cassel translates this clause as follows (reading  $\text{לְשָׁנָה}$ , instead of  $\text{לְשָׁנָה}$ , see the Commentary below): "And they vexed and plagued the sons of Israel, as this year, eighteen years long," etc. The better way is to repeat the idea of the verbs after "eighteen years," thus: "And they broke and crushed the sons of Israel in that year; eighteen years did they oppress all the sons of Israel who were beyond the Jordan," etc.  $\text{שָׁנָה}$  and  $\text{שָׁנָה}$  come from the same root, and are synonyms used to strengthen the idea. — Ta.]

[2 Ver. 9. — Literally: "and it became exceedingly strait to Israel," cf. ch. ii. 15. On the use of the fem. gender ( $\text{לְיִשְׂרָאֵל}$ , from  $\text{יִשְׂרָאֵל}$ ) in impersonal constructions, see Green, Gram., 243, 3. — Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Ver. 6. And the sons of Israel continued to do the evil in the sight of Jehovah. Sin and forgiveness are the hinges of all history, especially of the history of Israel, including in that term the spiritual Israel of modern times. They follow each other like night and morning. As soon as the prayers and faith of a great man cease from among the people, and the earth is heaped over his grave, the new generation breaks loose, like an unrestrained youth. After Jair's death, idolatry spreads far and wide. Israel plays the harlot, in the east with Aram, in the west with the Phœnicians, in the southeast with Moab and Ammon, in the southwest with the Philistines. Those gods are named first, whose people have already oppressed Israel, and have been turned back by men of God. First, the Baalim and Ashtaroth, whose service Gideon especially, the Jerubbaal, overthrew (ch. vi. 25); next, the gods of Aram, whose king was defeated by the hero Othniel; then, the gods of Zidon, the mention of whom — since Zidon, the metropolis, stood for all Phœnicia, i. e. Canaan — reminds us of the victory of Deborah and Barak over Jabin, king of Canaan; and finally, the gods of Moab, smitten by Ehud. Israel served these gods, although they were unable to stand before the eternal God. And beside these, it now also serves the gods of the Ammonites and Philistines. These also will first cause it to experience oppression; but then, though only after long penance, become the occasion of divine displays of grace and mercy to Israel. In truth, this "young" Israel serves all gods, except only the living and the true. It runs after every superstition, every delusion, every sensual gratification, every self-deception, but forgets the truth and peace of God. It seeks false friends, and forsakes the true.

Vers. 7-10. And He delivered them into the hand of the Philistines, and into the hand of the sons of Ammon. As far as their sufferings and conflicts with the western nations are concerned, these are related subsequently under the history of Samson. The chastisement which they experience by means of Ammon, leads the way. This falls especially upon the people east of the Jordan, the neighbors of Ammon; and the enervating and weakening effects of sin and unbelief become clearly manifest in the fact that one of the most valiant of the Israelitish tribes, Gilead, the home, as it were, of heroes, is not able successfully to oppose the enemy. Israel is pressed, plagued, plundered; "as in the first year,<sup>1</sup> so through eighteen years" (for  $\text{לְשָׁנָה}$  read  $\text{לְשָׁנָה}$ ). The inflictions to which they were obliged to submit one year, the spoliation of their harvests, the plundering of their villages, the imposition of tribute, are repeated year after year, eighteen times. The manifest weakness of Israel, the dismemberment of the nation, so that one tribe finds no help from any other (ch. xii. 2), emboldens the oppressor. Ammon passes over the Jordan, and attacks Israel in the heart of its most powerful tribes, without meeting resistance. But how came Israel into such a condition of disruption? Whence this inability to unite its forces against the overbearing enemy? This question has already been answered in ver. 6. The people has forsaken the one God, and worships many idol gods. Falling away from the national faith, it has fallen into the disintegration of egoism. The tribes are divided by their special idols, their respective evil consciences, and by local selfishness. Only one thing is common to all, — despondency and powerlessness; for the ideal spirit of the theocratic people, the source of union and courage, is wanting. Hence, after long distress, they all share in a common feeling of repentance. They come now to the tabernacle, long neglected — for while attending at near and local idol temples, they have forgotten to visit the House of God — and say: we have sinned.

Vers. 11, 12. And Jehovah said to the sons of Israel, Not from Mizraim (Egypt), and from the Amorite, from the sons of Ammon, and from the Philistines! It is the Priest who answers the people, in the name of God, through Urim and Thummim, as in ch. i. 1. It has been observed that in ver. 6 seven different national idols are enumerated as having been served by Israel, and that in vers. 11 and 12 seven nations are named, out of whose hand Israel had been delivered. The number seven is symbolical of consummation and completion. All false gods, whom Israel has foolishly served, are included with those that are likely. Hitherto, apostasy and servitude have always followed the death of the Judge. If the present case were an exception, the narrator would certainly have noted it as such. The use of the word "this," would perhaps be quite plain, if we could have a glance at the sources from which the narrator here draws. — Ta.]

named in ver. 6, from the northeast and southeast, the northwest and southwest. Such, undoubtedly, is likewise the sense of vers. 11 and 12. To Israel's prayer for deliverance from Ammon in the land of the Amorite, and from the Philistines, God replies, reproachfully: that Israel bears itself as if it had sinned for the first time, and asked deliverance in consideration of its repentance. But, says God, from of old I have liberated you from all the nations that surround you, — from Egypt first, and from every nation that troubled you — east, west, north, and south, — in turn. The voice of God speaks not in the style of narrative, but in the tone of impassioned discourse. Under general descriptions, it comprehends, with rhetorical vigor, special occurrences. It introduces the Ammonites, Philistines, and Amorites, immediately after Egypt, because these nations are now in question. Have I not already, since your exodus from Egypt, given you peace, even from these very Philistines (Ex. xiii. 17), Ammonites (Num. xxi. 24), and Amorites (Num. xxi. 21 ff.)? Thereupon, the discourse passes over into another construction: for from the ancient part it turns now to events of more recent times. In those early times, when Moses led you, you saw no oppression, but only victory. Later, when Zidonians, Amalekites, and Maonites oppressed you, I helped you at your cry. All three names indicate only in a general way, the quarters from which the more recent attacks had come. Since Joshua's death, Israel had experienced only one attack from the north and northeast, all others had come from the east and southwest. That from the north, was the act of Jabin, king of Canaan. It is true, that in the narrative of Barak's victory, the name Zidonians does not occur; but Zidon is in emphatic language the representative, the mother, as she is called, of Phœnicia, i. e. Canaan. In a like general sense do Amalek and Maon here stand for those eastern tribes from whose predatory incursions Israel had suffered; for Amalek, the earliest and most implacable enemy of Israel, assisted both Midian and Moab in their attacks. Thus also, the mention of Maon becomes intelligible. Modern expositors (even Keil) consider the Septuagint reading Maḏiḏu (Midian) to be the correct one. We cannot adopt this view; for this reason, if no other, that difficult readings are to be preferred to plain ones. Maon is the name of the southeastern wilderness, familiar to us from David's history. The name has evidently been preserved in the Maon of Arabia Petrea (cf. Ritter, xiv. 1005). Amalek and Maon represent the Bedouin tribes, who from this quarter attacked Israel. Every point from which Israel could be assailed has thus been included; for the first three nations, Philistines, Ammonites, and Amorites, range from the southwest to the northeast, just as the other three, Zidonians, Amalekites, and Maonites, reach from the northwest to the southeast.

Vers. 13-16. Go, and cry unto the gods which ye have chosen. From all nations, says the voice of God, have I liberated you. It has been demonstrated to you that I am your true Deliverer, and that all the tribes round about you are your enemies, especially when they perceive that you have forsaken Me. Every part of your land teaches this lesson; and yet you apostatize always anew. I have chosen you without any merit on your part, to be a great nation, and you have left Me; go, therefore, in this your time of need, and get you help from the idol gods whom you have chosen in my place. This answer cuts the sharper, because the idols to whose service Israel apostatized, were identical with the very nations by whom they were oppressed. For every idol was national or local in its character. God speaks here with a sorrow like that of a human father who addresses an inconsiderate child. Nothing but a sharp goad of reprehension and threatening will drive it to serious and thorough consideration. But though inconsiderate, it nevertheless continues to be a child. The father, though for the present he disown it, cannot in good earnest intend to abandon it altogether. And, in truth, Israel did not miscalculate. When they not only confessed their sins, but even without any visible assistance, imitated Gideon, and in faith removed their idol altars, the anger of their Father was at an end. The phrase קָנְאוּ אֱלֹהֵיכֶם, elsewhere employed of men (cf. Num. xxi. 4, where the people find the way of the wilderness too long), is here applied with artless beauty to Israel's tender Father. "His soul became too short" for the misery of Israel, i. e. the misery of the penitent people endured too long for Him. He could no longer bring himself to cherish anger against them. The love of God is no rigid human consistency: it is eternal freedom. Man's parental love is its image, albeit an image obscured by sin. The parable of the Prodigal Son, especially, gives us some conception of the wonderful inconsistency of God, by which after chastisement He recalls the penitent sinner to himself. Nothing but the freedom of God's love — ever right as well as free — secures the world's existence. Love — as only God loves; love, which loves for God's sake; love, that pardons the penitent offender seven and seventy times, — is true consistency. Put away the strange gods, and the withered stock will become green again. This Israel experiences anew, and first in Gilead.

This notice, however brief, of the removal of all strange gods, and of Israel's return to Jehovah, is the necessary, intimately connected, introduction to the narrative of the deeds of Jephthah. It is indispensable to the understanding of his victory and suffering. It explains, moreover, why in the narrative concerning him, only the name Jehovah appears. It teaches us to consider the nature and measure of that life in which God, once lost but found again, reigns and rules.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL

Apostasy and Repentance. Neither Deborah's jubilant song of triumph, nor Gideon's exulting trumpet notes, could secure succeeding generations of Israel against renewed apostasy. It reappeared even after a season of quiet piety. But equally sure was the coming of divine judgments. They came from all sides, in ever-growing severity and magnitude. The gods of the heathen brought no help, — for they were nothing; and yet for their sake had Israel betrayed its living God. Then Israel began seriously to reflect. They not merely wept, they did works of true repentance. And whenever, by prayer and actions, they call upon their merciful God, He, like a tender father, cannot withstand them. He hears and answers.

Not so do men act toward each other; and yet they are called on to walk in the footsteps of Christ. What wonder that men find their kindness ill requited, when God experiences a similar treatment! But how then dare they cherish anger, when besought for reconciliation! If God was moved, how can we remain untouched? And yet grudge-bearing is a characteristic against which even pious Christians bear no grudge. The sinless God forgives, and gives ever anew, — and witnesses of God, men of theological pursuits, cherish ill-will and rancor for years!

"How well, my friend, in God thou livest, Appears from how thy debtor thou forgivest."

STARKE: Men are very changeable and inconstant, and prone to decline from the right way; neither sufficiently moved by kindness, nor influenced by punishment. — THE SAME: True repentance consists not in words but in deeds. —

LISCO: Israel confesses its guilt and ill-desert, and gives itself wholly up to God's will and righteous chastening; yet, full of faith, asks for merciful, albeit unmerited, deliverance. — GERLACH: That the Lord first declares that He will no longer help Israel, afterwards, however, takes compassion on them and makes their cause his own, is a representation which repeats itself frequently in the Old Testament. Each of its opposite elements is true and consistent with the other, as soon as we call to mind that God, notwithstanding his eternity and unchangeableness, lives with and loves his people in time, and under human forms and conditions.

CHAPTER X. 17, 18.

17 Then [And] the children [sons] of Ammon were gathered together, and encamped in Gilead. And the children [sons] of Israel assembled themselves together, and encamped in Mizpeh [Mizpah]. And the people and princes [the people (namely) the chiefs] of Gilead said one to another, What man is he [Who is the man] that will [doth] begin to fight against the children [sons] of Ammon? he shall be head over all the inhabitants of Gilead.

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

The call of Gideon to be a deliverer took place just when the national distress was at its greatest height, and Midian had entered on a new expedition of pillage and plunder. A like coincidence marked the present crisis. The sons of Ammon were just making a new incursion into Gilead, when they met with a new spirit. The signature of apostasy and sin, is discord and weakness, despondency and self-seeking, issuing in failure and disaster, whenever action be undertaken. The sign of conversion and true penitence is concord and confidence, leading, by God's assistance, to victory.

Ver. 17. And the sons of Ammon were gathered together . . . the sons of Israel also assembled themselves. The phrase "sons of Israel" does not always include all the tribes. The men of any single tribe may be so designated. The narrator uses the expression here, however, in order to intimate that though Gilead alone actually engages in the war it is nevertheless done as Israel, according to the mind and spirit of the whole nation. As soon as Israel repents, the collective national spirit, the consciousness of national unity through the calling of God, reawakes in each of the tribes. The localities at which the respective armies are said to have assembled and prepared for the conflict, will be considered under ch. xi. 29.

Ver. 18. And the body of the nobles of Gilead said. The hitherto cowed Israelites assembled themselves; but that was not all: they were moreover united in all they did. The narrative says expressly עַמְּלֵי גִלְעָד, "the people of the nobles of Gilead," i. e. all, without exception.<sup>1</sup> No envious, self-seeking voice of protest or dissent was heard. In times in which distress is recognized with real repentance, private interests cease to govern. People then begin to honor truth and actual merit. No deference is then paid to personal vanity, family connections, or wealth; but, all by-views and self-seeking being set aside, he is sought after who renders service. The nobles of Gilead could not more clearly indicate their new temper, than by unitedly promising to subordinate themselves to him who begins to render the banners of Israel once more victorious, as their head.

It is to be noted that they say, "whoso beginneth to fight against the sons of Ammon." In him who first again gains an advantage over the enemy in battle, it will be manifest that God is with him. He, accordingly, is to be, not what Gideon's legions desired him to become, their מֶלֶךְ, ruler, nor what the sinful people of Shechem made of Abimelech, their מֶלֶךְ, king, but their אֲשֵׁר, leader. Him, who conquers with God, they desire to follow unanimously, as a common head.

for the mere notion of totality. It is better to take עַמְּלֵי as standing in apposition to עַמְּ; "the people (namely) the chiefs of Gilead," i. e. the people through their chiefs, as represented by them. — Tr.]

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 3 — יִפְתָּחִים. Dr. Cassel here (cf. ch. ix. 4) renders, lose Leute, loose, unsettled persons. In his article on "Jephthah" in Herzog's Real-Encyclopädie, vi. 463, he describes them as — "people who had nothing to lose. The character and condition of such persons is more definitely described in 1 Sam. xxii. 2, where distressed persons, embarrassed debtors, and men of wild dispositions, are said to have attached themselves to the fugitive David." To prevent erroneous inferences, it is necessary to add the next sentence: "But that Jephthah, like David, engaged in marauding expeditions, cannot be proved." — Tr.]

[2 Ver. 11. — עָמָם. Dr. Cassel: Gesamtheit — "the collective body," — evidently with reference to his previous rendering in ch. x. 13. Cf. note 1, p. 161. — Tr.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

The story of Jephthah is one of the most remarkable episodes of the Sacred Scriptures. But at the same time it is one of those episodes which, from being too exclusively considered in the character of disconnected fragments, have been subjected both anciently and in modern times, to the most singular misapprehensions and distortions. It gives the moral likeness of an Israelitish tribe, in the time of its awakening and return to God. Manasseh is again the coöperating tribe, — not the western half, however, but the eastern, its equal in warlike spirit (1 Chr. v. 24) and strength, but holding a relation to the hero who appears among them different from that formerly held by the other toward Gideon. When Gideon entered on his work, everything depended on his own personality. No divine awakening had preceded, not even in his own city. In his own house, there was an altar to be destroyed. The number of those who deserved to be his followers was only three hundred. Even in the time of his success and greatness, it is he alone who keeps and upholds the divine life in the nation.

The history of Jephthah furnishes a different picture. Gilead too had sinned, but it had repented. The whole people had put away its false gods, before it found its hero. This hero, on his part, finds himself supported by a spiritually awakened tribe, thoroughly animated with the spirit of faith and obedience toward Jehovah. Every part of the picture is projected on a background of true piety. Jephthah is the hero, the leader, the head of the tribe: but he is not the only one whose eyes are fixed on God; the whole tribe, like members of the head, obey the same attraction. It is only because this background was ignored, i. e. because the connection between chapters x. and xi. was overlooked, that the principal incident in the history of Jephthah has from the earliest times given rise to such singular explanations.

Vers. 1, 2. And Jephthah the Gileadite was a valiant hero. The same terms were applied to Gideon by the Messenger of God (ch. vi. 12). The nobles of Gilead had determined (ch. x. 18) to elect as their leader, him who should give evidence that God is with him, by beginning to wage successful warfare. Thereupon the narrative proceeds: "And Jephthah was a valiant hero." It was he concerning whom they learned that he answered their description. His history is then related. A noble of Gilead had begotten him by a public harlot, and taken him into his house. The name of the father is unknown. In the statement: "Gilead begat Jephthah;" and also when we read of the "wife of Gilead;" the term "Gilead," as tribe name, takes the place of the unknown personal name. Not, indeed, as if "Gilead" could not be a personal name; but if it were, Jephthah would have been designated as "son of Gilead," and not as a "Gileadite," without any paternal surname, as he is styled at the first mention, when he enters on the scene, and at the last, when he dies (ch. xii. 7). This conclusion is strengthened by a comparison with the names of other heroes; with that of his predecessor Gideon, for instance, who is constantly styled the "son of Joash;" and also, among others, with that of one of his successors, "Eli the Zebulonite (ch. xii. 11), as to whom there can be no doubt that he was of the tribe of Zebulun, and had no more definite patronymic. — The father, subsequently, had other sons by his lawful wife. These, when they had grown up, and their father had died, expelled Gideon from the house, although the eldest; for, said they, —

Thou art the son of another woman (אֲנִי בֶן אִשָּׁה אֲחֵרָה). "Other" is here to be taken in a bad sense, as in the expression "other (acherim) gods." As those are spurious gods, so "another ishah" is a spurious wife. The expulsion of Jephthah was a base act; for his father had reared him in his house, and left him there, and he was the oldest child. The act cannot be compared with the removal of Ishmael and the sons of Keturah from the house of Abraham. Those the father himself dismissed with presents. But Jephthah's father had kept him in the house, and had thus signified his purpose to treat him as a son. Nevertheless, Jephthah could obtain no redress from the "elders of Gilead" (ver. 7). If he had been the son of one who was properly a wife, his brothers would doubtless have been obliged to admit him to a share in the inheritance; for Rachel, the ancestress of Gilead, had also several co-wives, whose sons — of whom, he it observed in passing, Gad in Gilead was one — inherited as well as Joseph himself. But they maintained that his mother had not been a wife of their father at all, not even one of secondary rank, — that she was nothing but an harlot. On the ground of bastardy, they could drive him out of the house; and at that time, no voice raised itself in Gilead but that of mockery and hatred toward Jephthah. Such being the case he fled.

Ver. 3. And dwelt in the land of Tob. The name Tob is found again in 2 Sam. x. 6, in connection with a war of the Ammonites against king David. Its subsequent mention in the Books of the Maccabees (I. ch. v. 13; II. xii. 17), as Tob, Tob, affords no material assistance to any attempt at identification. But since Jephthah flees thither as to an asylum; and since adventurers collect about him there, as in a region of safety, whence he is able to make successful expeditions, we may be justified perhaps to hazard a conjecture which would tend to increase our knowledge of the Hauran. Erets tob (אֶרֶץ טוֹב) means good land, and fertile, as Canaan is said to be (Ex. iii. 8). The best land in Hauran, still named from its fertility, and with which Wetzstein has made us again acquainted, is the Ruhbeh, in eastern Hauran. Its name signifies, "fertile cornfield." It is the best land in Syria. It is still the seat of Bedouin tribes, who extend their pillaging expeditions far and wide. Of the present tribes, Wetzstein relates that they frequently combine with the Zubé, whose name reminds us of the Zabadeans (1 Macc. xii. 31). Their land is an excellent place of refuge, difficult of attack, and easily defended.

At the head of adventurous persons whom the report which soon went out concerning his valor, had collected about him, he made warlike expeditions like those of David (1 Sam. xxii. 2), directed, as David's were also, against the enemies of his nation. Of the son of Jesse, it is true, we know for certain that, notwithstanding his banishment, he attacked and defeated the Philistines (cf. 1 Sam. xxiii. 1 ff.); but though we have no such direct statements concerning Jephthah, we yet have good grounds for concluding that his expeditions were directed against the Ammonites. For he evinced himself to be a mighty hero; and the Gileaditish nobles had pledged themselves to elect him as their head who should initiate victories over Ammon. Therefore, when their choice falls on Jephthah, it must be because they have heard of his deeds in the land of Tob against this enemy. — Modern writers, especially, have made a real Abälino of Jephthah, steeped in blood and pillage. The character belongs to him as little as to David. Though banished, he was a valiant guerilla chieftain of his people against their enemies: He was the complete opposite of an Abimelech. The latter sought adventurers (רִמְיָה) for a wicked deed; to Jephthah, as to David, they come of their own accord and subordinate themselves to him. Abimelech was without cause an enemy of his father's house, and dipped his sword in the blood of his own brothers. Jephthah, banished and persecuted by his brothers, turned his strength against the enemies of Israel; and when recalled, cherished neither revenge nor grudge in his heart. Abimelech had fallen away from God; Jephthah was his faithful servant. All this appears from his words and conduct.

Vers. 4-6. And after a considerable time it came to pass that the sons of Ammon made war with Israel. It was during the time of sin and impenitence, that Jephthah was driven away by violence and hatred. He returned as an elderly man, with a grown-up daughter. The Ammonitish conflict and oppression lasted eighteen years. The flight of Jephthah to Tob occurred probably some time previous to the beginning of these troubles. In the course of these years he had acquired fame, rest, house, and possessions. He had found God, and God was with him. If this were not his character, he would not have met the "elders of Gilead" as he did. Meanwhile, however, another spirit had asserted itself in Gilead also. For it is the sign of new life, that the elders of Gilead do not shun the humiliation of going to Jephthah. To be sure, they must have been informed that he also served no strange gods; for how otherwise could he be of service to them? In any case, however, it was no small matter to go to the hero whom, not his brothers only, but they also, the judges, had once ignominiously driven forth, and now say to him: Come with us, and be our captain! (יְצִיף: a leader in war, and according to later usage in peace also.)

Vers. 7-9. And Jephthah said unto the elders of Gilead, Did ye not hate me, and expel me out of my father's house? The interview between him and the elders affords a striking proof of the subduing influence which the confession of God exercises, even over persons of vigorous and warlike spirits. Jephthah's speech does not conceal the reproach, that after the hard treatment he received, they should have invited him back before this, not first now when they are in distress. He speaks in a strain similar to that in which the voice of God itself had recently addressed Israel (ch. x. 11).

And nobly do "the elders" answer him. For that very reason, say they, because we are in distress, do we come to thee. Such being the fact, thou wilt surely come. Did matters stand differently, thou wouldest probably (and not unjustly) refuse; but as it is, we call thee to go with us to fight, and be our head over all the inhabitants of Gilead. The satisfaction thus made to Jephthah is indeed great; but the danger and responsibility to which he is invited are not less eminent. His answer, nevertheless, exhibits no longer any trace of sensitiveness or pride. If his tribe call him to fight, he will obey their summons—as all heroes have ever done, who loved their native land. He, however, does it under a yet nobler impulse. Under other circumstances—such is the underlying thought—I would not have come to be your head. If you were now as heretofore, who would wish to come! for far as it is from being a blessing to the trees when the thorn-bush reigns, so far is it from pleasing to a noble mind to rule over thorn-bushes. But since you come to get me to fight with you against Ammon—full of a new spirit, so that I can cherish the hope that God will deliver the enemy before me—I consent to be your head. It is not to be overlooked that Jephthah speaks of "Jehovah," not of "Elohim," and that he places the issue in God's hand; for, as ch. x. teaches, Gilead had learned to see that only God can help. Jephthah is called because God's Spirit is recognized in him. Verse 9 has often been taken as a question; a construction which Keil has already, and very properly, rejected.<sup>1</sup> The position of affairs has altogether erroneously been so apprehended, as if Jephthah were fearful lest, after victory achieved, they would then no longer recognize him as head, and wished to assure himself on this point beforehand. This view originates in the failure to perceive the spiritual background on which the action is projected. Jephthah is not a man who will be their head at any cost. There is no trace of ambition in his language. He is willing to be their head, if they are such members as will insure the blessing of God. Whoever knows his countrymen as he knew them, and has himself turned to God, will not be willing to be their leader, unless they have become other than they were. For that reason he says: If you bring me back, in order truly and unitedly to fight Ammon, and be worthy of God's blessing,—in that case, I will be your head. The guaranty of victory is sought by this valiant man, not in his own courage, but in the worthiness of the warriors before God.

Ver. 10. Jehovah be a hearer between us, if we do not so according to thy word. They invoke God, whom they have penitently supplicated, as witness; they swear by Him that they will do whatever Jephthah will command. They give him thereby a guaranty, not only that as soldiers they will obey their general, but also that in their conduct towards God they will be guided by their leader's instruction and direction. For not in military discipline only, but much rather in the moral and religious spirit by which Israel is animated, lies his hope of victory.

Ver. 11. And Jephthah spake all his words before Jehovah in Mizpah. Jephthah goes along; the people—the collective nobility—make him head and leader; but not by means of sin and dishonor, as Abimelech became king. Jephthah receives his appointment from the hand of God. In the spirit of God, he enters on his work. As chieftain, it devolves on him to tell his people what course must be pursued: he does it in the presence of God. It is the ancient God of Israel before whom, at Mizpah, where the people are encamped, he issues his regulations, addresses, and military orders. On Mizpah, see at ch. xi. 29.

Keil has justly repelled the idea that the expression לִפְנֵי יְהוָה, "before Jehovah," necessarily implies a solemn sacrificial ceremony. But, on the other hand, the impossibility of such a solemnity cannot be maintained. Whatever the ceremonial may have been, the meaning is, that Jephthah, in speaking all his words before God, thereby confessed Jehovah and his law, in contradistinction to heathenism and idolatry. In the spirit of this confession, he entered on his office.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

The manner in which divine compassion fills men with his Spirit, for the salvation of Israel, is wonderful. The inquiry into the origin of the heroes who suddenly arise in Israel, and in nations generally, to deliver and save, is one which leads down into the profoundest depths of divine wisdom. The selection of every Israelitish Judge is a new sign of compassion, but also of corrective chastening. For presumption and self-sufficiency were always at the bottom of their apostasies. Hence, in the selection of the Judges, the admonition to humility becomes continually more urgent. Israel is made to know that God chooses whom He wills, and raises from the dust him whom the people will place at their head. They have already experienced this in the cases of Ehud, the left-handed, of Deborah, a woman, of Gideon, the youngest and least of his family. All these, however, had been well-born persons, connected with the people by normal relations. In Jephthah's case, the choice becomes still more extraordinary. A bastard, an exile and adventurer, must be gone after. The magnates of the land must humble themselves to bring the exile home, to submit themselves to him, and make him the head of the tribe. That they do it, is proof of their repentance; that the choice is just, is shown by the result.

Thus, many a stone, rejected by the builders, has, typically, even before Christ, become the head of the corner. Unbelief deprives a nation of judgment. To discern spirits, is a work to be done only by an inward life in God. Sin expels whomsoever it cannot overcome; but penitence recalls him, whenever it perceives the ground of its own distress. Only he, however, returns without a grudge in his heart, who shares in the penitence.

[BP. HALL: The common gifts of God respect not the parentage or blood, but are indifferently scattered where He pleases to let them fall. The choice of the Almighty is not guided by our rules: as in spiritual, so in earthly things, it is not in him that willeth. — SCOTT: As the sins of parents so often occasion disgrace and hardship to their children, this should unite with higher motives, to induce men to govern their passions according to the law of God. — BUSH: The pretense of legal right, is often a mere cover to the foulest wrongs and injuries. — HENRY: The children of Israel were assembled and encamped, ch. x. 17; but, like a body without a head, they owned they could not fight without a commander. [1 Ver. 13. — Dr. Cassel omits "Because." <sup>1</sup>בְּ, in this place, may be either the sign of a direct quotation, as which it would be sufficiently indicated by a colon after "Jephthah"; or a causal conjunction (E. Both he and Bertheau, however, refer the suffix to "the Amorite," and are then obliged to make the Amorite stand for the "land of the Amorite." — Ta.]

[3 Ver. 25. — יִירָשׁוּ, to contend in words, to plead before a judge. Dr. Cassel translates by rechten, to litigate, which must here of course be taken in a derivative sense. — Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Ver. 12. The peaceable negotiations into which Jephthah, before he proceeds to war, enters with Ammon, demonstrate — and the less successful such efforts usually are, the more characteristically — the truly God-fearing character of the new chieftain. The Ammonites were a strong and valiant people (cf. Num. xxi.; Deut. ii. 20, 21); but it was not on this account that he sought to negotiate with them once more. The Ammonites were descended from Lot, the nephew of Abraham; and Israel, on their journey to Canaan, had not been allowed to assail them (Deut. ii. 19). Jephthah, before he draws the sword, wishes to free himself from every liability to be truthfully charged with the violation of ancient and sacred prescriptions. He desires to have a clear, divine right to war, in case Ammon will not desist from its hostile purposes. He hopes for victory, not through strength of arms, but through the righteousness of his cause. This he would secure; so that he may leave it to God to decide between the parties.

What is there between me and thee, מַה־בֵּינִי וּבֵינֶךָ. A proverbial form of speech, which may serve the most divergent states of mind to express and introduce any effort to repel and ward off. While it might here be rendered, "What wilt thou? what have I done to thee?" in the mouth of the prophet Elisha, repelling the unholy king (2 Kgs. iii. 13), it means, "How comest thou to me? I know thee not!" and in that of the woman whose sorrow for the loss of her child breaks out afresh when she sees Elijah (1 Kgs. xvii. 18), "Alas, let me alone, stay away!" The Gospel translated it by τί μοῦ καὶ σοί; in which form it appears in the celebrated passage, John ii. 4, where Jesus speaks to Mary. But it has there not the harsh sense, "What have I to do with thee!" (which it has not even here in the message of Jephthah), but only expresses a hurried request for silence, for his "hour was not yet come."

Ver. 13. Israel took away my land. For a question of right, Ammon, like other robbers and conquerors, was not at all prepared; but since it is put, the hostile king cannot well evade it. Reasons, however, have never been wanting to justify measures of violence. Although unacquainted with the arts of modern state-craft, ancient nations, as well as those of later times, understood how to base the demands of their desires on historical wrongs. Only, such claims, when preferred by nations like the Ammonites, usually did not wear even the appearance of truth. The king of Ammon seeks to excuse his present war against Israel, by asserting that when Israel came up out of Egypt they took from him the territory between Arnon, Jabbok, and Jordan, about coextensive with the inheritance of Reuben and Gad. It was utterly untrue. For when Israel went forth out of Egypt, this territory was in the hands of Sihon, king of the Amorites, who ruled in Heshbon (Num. xxi.). This king, it is true, had obtained it by conquest; but not so much from Ammon as from Moab, even though some connection of the Ammonites with the conquered lands is to be inferred from Josh. xiii. 25. Israel itself had fought with

Jephthah does not fail to reduce this false pretense to its nothingness; for it was of the utmost importance in his view to make it manifest that the war, on the side of the Ammonites, was thoroughly unjust. The memoir which he sends to the king of Ammon, is as clear as it is instructive. It shows the existence of a historical consciousness in the Israel of that day, asserting itself as soon as the people became converted to God. For only a believing people is instructed and strengthened by history. Jephthah unfolds a piece of the history of Israel in the desert. It has been asked, in what relation the statements here made stand to those contained in the Pentateuch. The answer is, that the message of Jephthah makes a free use of the statements of the Pentateuch.

Vers. 15-28. Thus saith Jephthah. This introduction to ver. 15 already indicates the free combination by Jephthah, of statements derived from the ancient records. That which is of peculiar interest in this document, and strongly evinces its originality, is, that while the turns of the language and the various verbal repetitions (already pointed out in the text) indicate the source whence it was borrowed, its departures from that source evidence the freedom with which the material is used for the end in view. Nothing is said which is not contained in the Pentateuch; only a few facts, of present pertinence, are brought forward and freely emphasized. Bertheau is inaccurate, when he thinks that the statement in ver. 17, concerning Israel's sending to Moab to ask for passage through their land and Moab's refusal, is altogether new. For in the first place the perfect equality of Edom and Moab as regards the policy pursued towards them by Moses, is already intimated in Deut. ii. 9; and in the next place, ver. 29 of the same chapter makes Moses request Sihon to give a passage to Israel through his land, and that he will not do "as the sons of Esau and the Moabites did," to wit, deny them. That which connects ver. 29 with ver. 28 (Deut. ii.), is not that Esau and Moab had granted what Moses now requests of Sihon, but that they had not allowed his petition, by reason of which he is compelled to demand it of Sihon.<sup>1</sup> Here, therefore, it is plainly intimated, that Moab also refused a passage. This fact, Jephthah clothes in his own language, and weaves into his exact narrative with the selfsame design with which Moses alluded to it in the passage already quoted, namely, to prove that Israel was compelled by necessity to take its way through the land of the Amorite. The same tracing of events to their causes, leads Jephthah in ver. 20 to say of Sihon: "he trusted not Israel," whereas Num. xxi. 23 merely says: "he permitted not." Jephthah seeks to give additional emphasis to the fact, that if Sihon lost his land, the fault lay not with Israel. Sihon could not but see that no other passage remained for Israel; but he refused to credit the peaceable words of Moses. His distrust was his ruin. Further: instead of the expression, "until I pass over Jordan, into the land which Jehovah our God giveth us" (Deut. ii. 29), Jephthah writes, "let us pass through thy land to my place." At that time, he means to say, the Canaan this side the Jordan was Israel's destination; for not till after that—and this is why he changes the phraseology—did God give us Canaan beyond the Jordan also. For the same reason he substitutes "Israel" for "Moses" in the expression, "And Moses sent messengers" (Num. xx. 14). Over against Ammon, he brings Israel into view as a national personality.

On the basis of this historical review, Jephthah in a few sentences places the unrighteousness of his demands before the king of Ammon. What, therefore, Jehovah our God allowed us to conquer—that thou wilt possess? thou, who hadst no claims to it at any time, since, properly speaking, it was never thine? If any party could maintain a claim, it was Moab; but Balak, the king of Moab, never raised it, nor did he make war on that account. The conquest, by virtue of which Israel held the land, was not the result of wrongful violence, but of a war rashly induced by the enemy himself. God gave the victory and the land. A more solid title than that which secures to Israel the country between the Arnon and the Jabbok, there cannot be. Or has Ammon a better for his own possession? Were they not taken by force of arms from the Zamzumim (Deut. ii. 21)? or, as Jephthah expresses it, "were they not given thee by Chemosh, thy god?" He makes use of Ammon's own form of thought and expression. Chemosh

(the desolator, from שָׁמַשׁ = דָּשַׁשׁ) is the God of War. As such, he can here represent the god of Ammon, although usually regarded as the Moabitish deity; for it is the martial method in which Ammon obtained his land on which the stress is laid. Chemosh is war personified, hence especially honored by the Moabites, whose Ar Moab, the later Areopolis, is evidently related to the Greek Ares<sup>2</sup> (Mars). Hence also the representation of him on extant specimens of ancient Ara-

1 [This interpretation of Deut. ii. 29, which would clear it of all appearance of conflict with Num. xx. 14-20, is unfortunately not supported by the language of the original. The natural rendering of the text is substantially that of the E. V.: "Thou shalt sell me food for money, that I may eat; and thou shalt give me water for money, that I may drink; only I will pass through on my feet: as did unto me the sons of Esau who dwell in Seir, and the Moabites who dwell in Ar: until I pass over Jordan, into the land which Jehovah our God giveth us." The reader's first thought is, that the conduct of Edom and Moab is referred to as a precedent covering both parts of the present request to Sihon: "Sell me food and grant me a passage—as Edom and Moab did, so do thou." But history relates that Edom denied a passage, and that Israel made a detour around the Edomite territories. May we then regard the precedent as referring only to the matter of supplies? and the clause which recalls it to the memory of Sihon, as occupying a place after that which a logical arrangement of the clauses would assign it? This supposition, by no means unlikely in itself, seems to be favored by the construction of the sentence. It does not, however, relieve the passage of all difficulty. For it still leaves the implication that Edom and Moab sold food and water to Israel, whereas according to Num. xx. 20 they refused to do that also. Kell therefore argues that this refusal was made when Israel was on the western boundary of Edom, where the character of the mountains made it easy to repulse an army; but that when Israel had reached their eastern boundary, where the mountains sink down into vast elevated plains, and present no difficulty to an invading army, the Edomites took counsel of prudence, and instead of offering hostilities to the Israelites, contented themselves with the profitable sale of what would otherwise have been taken by force. This is at least a plausible explanation, although not founded on historical evidence, unless, what is by no means improbable, Deut. ii. 2-9 is designed to explain the course of actual events by a statement of divine instructions. — Ta.]

opolitan coins, where he appears with a sword in his right, and a lance and shield in his left hand, with torches on either side (Eckhel, Doctr. Nummorum, iii. 394; Meyers, Phönizier, i. 334).

Jephthah is sincere in this reference to the title by which Ammon holds his land. He does not dispute a claim grounded on ancient conquest. For in Dent. ii. 21, also, it is remarked, from a purely Israelitish point of view, that "Jehovah gave the land to the sons of Ammon for a possession." Quite rightly too; inasmuch as Jehovah is the God of all nations. But as Jephthah desires to speak intelligibly and forcibly to Ammon, who does not understand the world-wide government of Jehovah, he connects the same sentiment with the name of Chemosh, to whom Ammon traces back his warlike deeds and claims.<sup>1</sup> He thereby points out, in the most striking and conclusive manner, that if Ammon refuses to recognize the rights of Israel to its territory, he at the same time undermines, in principle, his own right to the country he inhabits. Aside from this, 300 years have passed since Israel first dwelt in Heshbon, Aroer, and on the banks of the Arnon. The statement exhibits a fine geographical arrangement: Heshbon, as capital of the ancient kingdom, is put first; then, to the north of it, Aroer (or Aror, probably so called to distinguish it from the southern Aroer) in Gad, over against the capital of Ammon; and finally, in the south, the cities on the Arnon. Possession, so long undisputed, cannot now be called in question. Jephthah concludes, therefore, that on his side no wrong had been committed; but Ammon seeks a quarrel — may God decide between them! But Ammon hearkened not — a proof how little the best and most righteous state papers avail, when men are destitute of good intentions. On the other hand, let this exposition of Jephthah be a model for all litigating nations, and teach them not only to claim, but truly to have, right and justice on their side. For God, the judge, is witness and hearer for all.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

<sup>1</sup> [Wordsworth: "It does not seem that Jephthah is here using the language of insult to the Ammonites, but is giving them a courteous reply. He appears to recognize Chemosh as a local deity; and he speaks of the Lord as the

ness; 2. Firm in its maintenance of righteous claims; yet, withal, 3. Winning and conciliating in its tone. — The most upright diplomacy may fail to avert war; but it is nevertheless powerful for the right. Israel doubtless fought better, and with higher feelings, when it saw the righteousness of its cause so nobly set forth; while the enemy must have been proportionably depressed by convictions of an opposite character. — Jephthah's diplomacy as contrasted with that of the king of Moab. Alas, that representatives of Christian nations should so often imitate the heathen king rather than the Hebrew Judge, and that Christian nations should uphold them in it!

HENRY: Jephthah did not delight in war, though a mighty man of valor, but was willing to prevent it by a peaceable accommodation. War should be the last remedy, not to be used till all other methods of ending matters in variance have been tried in vain. This rule should also be observed in going to law. The sword of justice, as the sword of war, must not be appealed to till the contending parties have first endeavored by gentler means to understand one another, and to accommodate matters in variance (1 Cor. vi. 1). — THE SAME: (on vers. 17, 18): Those that conduct themselves inoffensively, may take the comfort of it, and plead it against those that charge them with injustice and wrong. Our righteousness will answer for us in time to come, and will "put to silence the ignorance of foolish men." — THE SAME: One instance of the honor and respect we owe to God, as our God, is, rightly to possess that which He gives us to possess, receive it from Him, use it for Him, keep it for his sake, and part with it when He calls for it. — THE SAME: (on vers. 27, 28): War is an appeal to heaven, to God the Judge of all, to whom the issues of it belong. If doubtful rights be disputed, He is thereby requested to determine them; if manifest rights be invaded or denied, He is thereby applied to to vindicate what is just, and punish what is wrong. As the sword of justice was made for lawless and disobedient persons (1 Tim. i. 9), so was the sword of war for lawless and disobedient princes and nations. In war, therefore, the eye must be ever up to God; and it must always be thought a dangerous thing to desire or expect that God should patronize unrighteousness. — TR.]

CHAPTER XI. 29–33.

- 29 Then the Spirit of the Lord [Jehovah] came upon Jephthah, and he passed over [through] Gilead, and [namely,] Manasseh, and passed over [through] Mizpeh of Gilead [Mizpeh-Gilead], and from Mizpeh of Gilead [Mizpeh-Gilead] he passed 30 over unto [against] the children [sons] of Ammon. And Jephthah vowed a vow unto the Lord [Jehovah], and said, If thou shalt without fail<sup>1</sup> deliver the children
31 [sons] of Ammon into mine hands, Then it shall be, that whatsoever cometh forth [out] of the doors of my house to meet me, when I return in peace from the children [sons] of Ammon, shall surely be the Lord's [Jehovah's], and I will offer it

32 up for a burnt-offering. So [And] Jephthah passed over unto the children [sons] of Ammon to fight against them: and the Lord [Jehovah] delivered them into his 33 hands. And he smote them from Aroer even till thou come to Minnith, even twenty cities, and unto the plain of the vineyards [unto Abel Keramim], with a very great slaughter. Thus the children [sons] of Ammon were subdued before the children [sons] of Israel.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 30. — It would be better, perhaps, with Dr. Caspi to omit the words "without fail." The Hebrew infinitive before the finite verb serves to intensify the latter; but the endeavor to give its value in a translation, is very apt to result in the suggestion of thoughts or shades of thought foreign to the original. Cf. Ges. Gram. 181, §, a. — Tr.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Vers. 29, 33. Noble words are followed by splendid deeds. It is, however, no easy matter to determine the geographical arena in which the history of Jephthah is enacted. The sons of Israel, according to ch. x. 17, assembled themselves in Mizpah. To Mizpah also, Jephthah is brought from the land of Tob; and there he utters his words before Jehovah (ch. xi. 11). This Mizpah cannot be identical with Mizpeh-Gilead; for, according to ver. 29, Jephthah "proceeded — namely, from Mizpah — through Gilead, even through that part of it which belonged to Manasseh, thence to Mizpeh-Gilead, and from Mizpeh-Gilead against the sons of Ammon." The position of Mizpeh-Gilead may be probably determined. According to Josh. xiii. 26, there was in the territory of Gad a place called Ramath ha-Mizpeh. This place, the same doubtless which is elsewhere called Ramoth-Gilead (1 Kgs. iv. 13) and Ramoth in Gilead (Josh. xxi. 38), a possession of the Levites, and distinguished as a city of refuge (Josh. xxi. 8 ff.), is with great probability referred to the site of the present es-Salt, in modern times the only important place south of the Jabbok, the central point of the Belka, and meeting-place of all its roads (Ritter, xv. 1122). Being built around the sides of a steep hill, which is still crowned with a castle, this place answers very well to a city bearing the name Ramoth (Height). It is still a place of refuge; and, as Seetzen relates, those who flee thither, are, according to ancient custom, protected by the inhabitants, even at the risk of their own lives. Now, as Ramoth ha-Mizpeh may be compared with es-Salt, so Mizpeh or ha-Mizpeh Gilead with what in modern times is called el-Belka.<sup>1</sup> If this be allowed, the point of departure of Jephthah's course of victory is plain. From Mizpeh-Gilead he pressed forward against the enemy, and smote him "from Aroer" (ver. 33). Now, according to Josh. xiii. 25, Aroer lay over against Rabbath Ammon (at present Ammán), the capital of the Ammonites, and its position may therefore not improperly be compared with that of the modern Aired. The places "unto" which Jephthah smote the enemy, Minnith and Abel Keramim, can scarcely be discovered. They only indicate the wealth and cultivation of the now desolate land. Minnith supplied Tyre with wheat (Ezek. xxvii. 17). As to Abel Keramim (Meadow of Vineyards), it implies the vicinity of the Ammonitish capital, whose ruins, and also many of its coins, still exhibit the grape-bunch prominent among their ornaments (Ritter, xv. 1152, 1157). But with all this, Mizpah, whence Jephthah and his men set out to go to es-Salt and Aired, pursuing their march through Gilead, more definitely, through the Gilead of Manasseh, north of the Jabbok, remains yet undetermined. Although it does not occur again, it must yet have been a place of some importance. Inasmuch as it has a name which characterizes its situation only in a general way, it may in later times have borne a different one. It seems to agree most nearly with what in Josh. xi. 3 is called the "land of Mizpeh," — "the Hivite under Hermon in the land of Mizpeh." For, as is also stated 1 Chr. v. 23, "the half tribe of Manasseh dwelt in the land of Bashan, as far as Baal-Hermon, and Senir, and Mt. Hermon." Now, the Pella of later times, so named on account of the similarity of its situation to the Macedonian city of the same name — it lay on a height, surrounded by water — is said formerly to have been called Butis, still in agreement with the Macedonian city, which lay in the district Bottizeis. A similarity of sound between the name Butis and Mizpah could only then be found, if it might be assumed that as Timnah was also called Timnath, so Mizpah had also been called Mizpatah. It would at all events be worth while to fix, even conjecturally, upon the place where the great hero prepared himself for his victory. As he enters on the conflict, the Spirit of Jehovah rests upon him. He has given the decision into Jehovah's hands; he looks to Him for victory; and to Him he makes a vow.

Vers. 30-32. This vow has been the subject of the most singular misapprehensions; and yet, rightly understood, it crowns the deep piety of this hero of God. Jephthah perceives the full significance of the course on which he decides. He knows how greatly victory will strengthen faith in God throughout all the tribes. He sees a new Israel rise up. The people have trustingly committed themselves to his leadership, and he has uttered all his "words before Jehovah." In this state of mind, he bows himself before his God (1 Sam. i. 28), and makes a vow.<sup>2</sup> To the national being only a division of Gilead. But Ramoth may be identified with es-Salt in the Belka; hence the ancient district Mizpeh may be compared with the modern province el-Belka. — Tr.]

2 For the history of the exegesis, and its characteristic points, I refer to my article "Jephthah," in Herzog's Real-Encyclopädie, the materials of which cannot here be reproduced, but the drift of which is here, I trust, provided with fresh support. The other recent literature on the subject is indicated by Kell, who justly explains that the assumption of a spiritual sacrifice is almost imperatively demanded. The opinions of the church fathers are collected in the Com-

1 [El-Belka is a modern division of the east-jordanic territory, and is bounded by Wady Zerka (the Jabbok) on the north, and by Wady Mojeb (the Arnon) on the south. It is evident, therefore, that our author regards Mizpeh-Gilead as the name of a district, not of a city. The reasoning from the identification of Ramoth-Mizpeh with es-Salt to that of Mizpeh-Gilead with el-Belka, is not so clear, but seems to be this: Since Ramoth-Mizpeh is also called Ramoth-Gilead and Ramoth in Gilead, it is to be inferred that Mizpeh, like Gilead, indicates the district in which Ramoth is situated, with this difference, however, that Mizpeh is more definite, spirit which expresses itself in the Bible, vows are the signs and expression of the deepest self-surrender to God. Jacob makes vows to be fulfilled on his prosperous return home (Gen. xxviii. 20 ff.). In the Psalms, "to pay one's vows," has become synonymous with "to live in God" (Ps. lxi. 8; cxvi. 16 ff.). The prophet describes the coming salvation of the nations by saying that they shall "make vows and perform them" (Isa. xix. 21). And this idea is deeply grounded in truth: for in the vows which man makes to God, there is evidently expressed a living faith in the divine omnipotence and omniscience. Man expects from Him, and would fain give to Him. The more one feels himself to have received from God, the more will he desire to consecrate to Him. Such is the feeling under which Jephthah makes his vow to Jehovah. He promises that if God grant him victory, and he return home crowned with success, "then that which goeth forth from the doors of my house to meet me, shall be Jehovah's, and I will present it as a whole burnt-offering." He makes this vow from the fullness of his conviction that victory belongs to God alone, and from the fullness of his love, which would give to God that which belongs to Him as the author of success. He would make it known to God, that he regards Him, and not himself, as the commander-in-chief. There exists, therefore, a profound connection between the words, "when I return in peace from the sons of Ammon," and the expression, "whatsoever cometh forth to meet me;" and it is essential to the right understanding of the vow that this be borne in mind. Victory will awaken great rejoicings among the people. They will meet the returning victor with loud acclamations of gladness. They will receive him with gifts and adornments, with garlands and dances. Such receptions were customary among all nations. The multitude scattered roses, myrtles,<sup>1</sup> and perfumes. Similar customs obtained in Israel (1 Sam. xviii. 6). Jephthah will be celebrated and praised. But not to him—to God, belongs the honor! That which is consecrated to him, belongs, wholly and entirely, to God. This is the first ground of his vow. Jephthah's overflowing heart knows not what to consecrate. He feels that nothing is sufficient to be presented to God. But all things are subject to God's disposal. Therefore, whatever comes forth over the threshold of his house to meet him, when he returns victorious,—it shall be for God. He will have no part in it. By this first ground of the vow, its analogy with heathen narratives is so far limited, that there is here no talk of a sacrifice to consist of just the first<sup>2</sup> whom he meets, and the first alone. Nor is it necessary to assume that הַיּוֹצֵא אֶת־הַבְּכוֹרָה, "that which goeth forth," must be understood to mean only one person. It is as little necessary as that in Num. xxx. 3 (2), where vows are treated of, the words mentary of Serarius. Bertheau's decision for an actual sacrificial death, may probably be explained by the supposition that he did not view the transaction freely and independently, but only with reference to the opinions of others, a proceeding of too frequent occurrence.

<sup>2</sup> Which is the decisive point in the legends concerning Idomeneus, as told by Servius, and Alexander, as related by Valerius Maximus (vii. 3; cf. my article in Herzog, vi. 472). This also is the turning point in a series of later, especially German, popular tales, in which the "first" is not so much freely promised to, as demanded by, the demon power who, for that price, has supported or delivered the הַיּוֹצֵא אֶת־הַבְּכוֹרָה, "that which proceedeth out of his mouth," must mean one word. The participle is in the singular on account of its neutral signification. This indefiniteness is the peculiar characteristic of the votive formula. Equally indefinite is the meaning of the verb הָיָה ("goeth forth"), which may be used of persons and things, men and animals (cf. Gen. ix. 10). But the occasion of the vow shows also that Jephthah must have thought of persons as coming forth to meet him. At all events, he cannot have thought that precisely a lamb or an ox would come forth from his doors to meet him. Notwithstanding the breadth of the vow, notwithstanding all its indefiniteness, which is left, as it were, to be filled out by God himself, the chieftain must have thought of persons coming to meet him; for they come forth on account of the victory, and for that reason may be given to God who gives the triumph. Doubtless, the abundance of his love is as boundless as that of his faith. As little as he analyzes the latter, by which God's victorious might enters his heart, so little does his vow separate and individualize the objects of the former. He calculates not—raises no difficulties: whatever comes to meet him, that he will give to God. But as surely as this does not include things beyond the range of possible contingencies, so surely must he have had some thoughts as to who might meet him on a victorious return home. And if he was aware that not only oxen and lambs might come out to meet him—for such a limitation would contradict the breadth of the vow itself—he was equally aware that not everything which might come forth, could be offered up like oxen and lambs.

Due stress being laid on the fact that the meeting is contemplated as one taking place in consequence of victory, there is suggested, for the further understanding of the vow, a second point of view, not yet properly considered. Jephthah's war is a national war against Ammon. The freedom and rights, which Israel had received from Jehovah, are thereby vindicated. The negotiations about the claims to certain lands, set up by Ammon, and refuted by Jephthah, have not been related in vain. They exhibit the God of Israel in his absolute greatness, over against Chemosh, the false deity of the Ammonites. Israel has repented; and it is not one man, but the whole tribe, that is represented as beseeching Jehovah for help. To bring out this contrast between Jehovah and the gods of the heathen, the history of Israel, which rests on the power and will of Jehovah, is referred to in a free and living way. Jephthah is conversant with the divine record. He calls on Jehovah to decide as judge between himself and Ammon (ver. 27), just as in his dealings with the Gileadites he appeals to Him as "Hearer" (ver. 11). He utters his words "before Jehovah," and the "Spirit of Jehovah" comes upon him. The name "Elohim" person from whom the sacrifice is required. This "first" is usually the person most beloved by him who, to his great regret, has made the promise (cf. Müllenhoff, Sagen, pp. 384, 385, 396; Sommer, Sagen, pp. 87, 181). Sometimes, the "first human being" is successfully rescued from the devil—for it is he who appears in Christian legends—by the substitution of an animal. In one of Müllenhoff's legends (p. 162, Anmerk.) a dog becomes the "first;" in Grimm's Mythologie, p. 978 (cf. Wolf, Deutsche Sagen, p. 417, etc.), it is a goat. No doubt, a mistaken exposition of Jephthah's vow, had its influence here. It is, therefore, the more important to insist that in the vow nothing is said of a first one who may meet the returning conqueror.

is not used, — for that Ammon considers applicable to his gods also, — but always that name which involves the distinctive faith of Israel, namely, Jehovah. All through, Jephthah is represented as familiar with the Mosaic institutes, and imbued with their spirit; and this just because the history deals with a national war against Ammon. The vow also, which Jephthah makes, is modeled by this contrast between Israel and Ammon. The tribes descended from Lot are especially notorious for the nature of their idolatrous worship. The abominations practiced by Ammon and Moab in honor of Milcom (as they called Molech) and Chemosh, are sufficiently familiar from the history of Israel under the kings (1 Kgs. xi. 7, etc.). The sacrifice of human beings, particularly children, formed a terrible part of their worship. They burned and slaughtered those whom they loved, in token of devotion and surrender to the dreaded demon. The same practices were generally diffused among the Phœnicians (cf. Movers, i. 302). On great national occasions, such as war or pestilence, parents vowed to sacrifice their children on the public altars. In the Second Book of Kings (ch. iii. 27) we have the horrible story of the king of Moab, who slaughtered his eldest son on the walls of his city. Without entering farther into this terrible superstition, the explanation of which by Movers is not exhaustive, thus much it is necessary to say here: that the sacrifices it required were regarded by the nations who offered them, as the highest expression of their self-surrender to the idol-god. Hence, it is only upon the background of this practice, that the offering of Isaac by Abraham can be rightly understood. Abraham is put to the proof, whether he will show the same free and obedient self-surrender. As soon as he has done that, it is made clear that such sacrifices God does not desire.

A similar contrast is unquestionably exhibited in the vow of Jephthah; only, here the reference is specially to Ammon. Jephthah appears before Jehovah with devotion and readiness to make sacrifices not inferior to that of which idolaters boast themselves. He promises to present to God whatever shall come to meet him. In the form of a vow, and with indefinite fullness, he declares his readiness to resign whatsoever God himself, by his providential orderings, shall mark out. It is precisely in this that the conscious opposition of the vow to the abominable sacrifices of the Ammonites expresses itself. The highest self-abnegation is displayed; but in connection with it, the will of God is sought after. God himself will determine what is acceptable to Him; and Jephthah knows that this God has said: "When thou art come into the land which Jehovah thy God giveth thee, thou shalt not learn to do after the abominations of those nations. There shall not be found among you any one that maketh his son or his daughter to pass through the fire (which was the Molech-worship of the Ammonites); . . . for every one that doeth these things, is an abomination unto Jehovah; and because of these abominations doth Jehovah thy God drive them out from before thee" (Deut. xviii. 9 ff.). To the expulsion of the nations by God, in favor of Israel, Jephthah<sup>1</sup> himself formerly appealed. We conclude, therefore, that the very formula of this vow, made on the eve of war with Ammon, excludes the idea of a human sacrifice.

The sacrificial system of Israel stands throughout in marked contrast with the Canaanitish Molech service. Its animal sacrifices are the spiritual symbols which it opposes to the abominations of Canaan. To see this, it is only necessary to refer once more to the sacrifice of Abraham. God says to him: Offer me Isaac for a whole burnt-offering (עֹלָה); and when Abraham is about to give Isaac wholly up, an animal is substituted for him (Gen. xxii. 2, 10 ff.). Since that time, עֹלָה (burnt-offering or whole burnt-offering) is the typical and technical term for an animal sacrifice, symbolical of perfect surrender and consecration to God. The offerings which were thus named, were wholly consumed by fire. Nothing was left of them. Hence, precisely עֹלָה, in its sense of animal sacrifice, presented a strong contrast with the worship of the Ammonites, for among them human beings were offered up in the same manner as the Israelites offered animals.

When Gideon is directed to destroy the altar of Baal, he is at the same time commanded to offer a bullock as a whole burnt-offering (עֹלָה) on an altar to be erected by himself, and to consume it with the wood of the Asherah (ch. vi. 26).<sup>2</sup> Such also is the whole burnt-offering (עֹלָה), to offer which permission is given to Manoah, the father of Samson, without any mention being made of the animal (ch. xiii. 16). The influence of worship on language in Israel, brought it about that עֹלָה, to offer, signifies the offering of an animal which is to be wholly consumed in the sacred fire. It is therefore significant and instructive, when in Jephthah's vow we find the expression: "It shall be Jehovah's, and I will present it as a whole burnt-offering (עֹלָה)". In no other instance in which the bringing of a whole burnt-offering is spoken of, is the additional expression, "it shall be Jehovah's," made use of, not even in the instances of Gideon and Manoah, although this of Jephthah is chronologically enclosed between them. How strangely would it have sounded, if it had been said to Gideon: "Take the bullock; it shall belong to Jehovah, and thou shalt present it as a whole burnt-offering. For the bullock is presented in order that Gideon may belong to God. It is offered, not for itself, but for men. It is placed on the altar of God, just because it is the property of man. It is foreign to the spirit of Biblical language and life to say of a sacrificial animal, "it shall belong to God," for the reason that the animal comes to hold a religious relation to God, only because it belongs to man, and is offered in man's behalf. An animal belonging to God, in a religious sense, without being offered up, is inconceivable. At least, it cannot be permitted to live.

Very important for this subject, is the passage in Ex. xiii. 12, 13. It is there commanded that, when Israel shall have come into Canaan, every tions on נָדָר and עֹלָה, but leaves them to be understood in their general and well known Biblical acceptation — עֹלָה being here the symbol of a spiritual truth, while yet it ignores animal sacrifices as little as does נָדָר, see Ps. li. 21 (19).

<sup>1</sup> That it is just Jephthah, and he as the hero of law and faith, who presents this contrast with Ammon and human sacrifices, those expositors have overlooked, who, in spite of the God who was with him, describe this very Jephthah as a barbarous transgressor of law.

first-born shall be set apart unto Jehovah, both the firstlings of every beast "which thou hast" (אֲשֶׁר יִהְיֶה לְךָ), and the first-born of man. The firstling of such animals as cannot be offered, the ass, for instance, is to be redeemed with money; or, if the owner do not wish to redeem it, he must kill it. The first-born of man, however, must be redeemed. The first-born animal is moreover set apart for God only on account of man, its owner. This substitutionary "belonging to God," it can only represent in death. Hence the expression, "it shall belong to God," is never used of animals, but they are said to be "offered." On the contrary, it can be applied only to human beings; "he shall belong to God," shall live for God, conscious of his own free will and of the divine Spirit, which consciousness is wanting in animals. Scripture itself gives this explanation, Num. iii. 12, where it is said: "Behold, I have taken the Levites from among the sons of Israel, instead of all the first-born; therefore, the Levites belong to me (לִּי) (לִּי הַלְוִיִּם)." The Levites belong to God for all Israel through their life; the first-born of animals, through their sacrificial death. Accordingly, Hannah also, when she makes her vow to God, says, that if a son be granted her, she will give him unto Jehovah; and when she brings him to the tabernacle, that he is "lent unto Jehovah (לִּיהוָה שָׂאֵל לַיהוָה, 1 Sam. i. 28) as long as he liveth."

We perceive, therefore, that in the words of Jephthah, "it shall be Jehovah's, and I will present it as a whole burnt-offering," there can be no mere tautology. The two clauses do not coincide in meaning; they cannot stand the one for the other.

It is necessary, however, to attend to every word of this remarkable verse. For the vow is a contract, every point of which has its importance, and in which not only one being is thought of, but in which all creatures, human beings as well as brute beasts, the few or the many, that may come forth to meet Jephthah, are included, and each is consecrated as his kind permits. The vow speaks of whatsoever cometh forth "out of the doors of my house." Many will come to meet him, but he can offer only of that which is his; over the rest he has no power of disposition. His promise extends to what comes out of his own house; and not to anything that comes accidentally, but to what comes "to meet him." It must come forth for the purpose of receiving him. But even then, the vow becomes binding only when he returns crowned with victory and salvation (בְּשָׁלוֹם וּבִצְלוֹת), and that, not over any and every foe, but over Ammon. If thus he be permitted to return, then whatever meets him "shall be Jehovah's, and he will present it as a whole burnt-offering."

The promise must necessarily be expressed with the greatest exactitude. This was demanded by the requirement of the law, that he who makes a vow "shall keep and perform that which is gone out of his lips, even as he vowed" (Deut. xxiii. 24 [23]; Num. xxx. 2). Had Jephthah thought only of animals, he would merely have employed the formula usual in such cases—"and I will present it unto thee as a whole burnt-offering." It would not have been sufficient to have said, "it shall belong to Jehovah," because an animal belongs to God in this sense only when sacrificed for men. Precisely the insertion of the words, "it shall belong to Jehovah," proves, therefore, that he thought also of human beings. The generality and breadth of the vow makes both clauses necessary, since either one alone would not have covered both men and animals. The first was inapplicable to animals, the second to human beings. Both being used, the one explains and limits the other. The main stress lies on the words, "it shall belong to Jehovah," for therein is suggested the ground of the vow. They also stand first. Were human beings in question? then the first clause went into full operation; and the second taught that a life "belonging to God" must be one as fully withdrawn from this earthly life as is the sacrificial victim not redeemed according to law; while the first limited the second, by intimating that a human being need not be actually offered up, as the letter of the promise seemed to require, but that the important point is that it belong wholly to God.

God demands no vows. It is no sin, when none are made. But when one has been made, it must be kept. Jephthah obtains the victory: God does his part; and the trying hour soon comes in which Jephthah must do his. But, as in battle, so in the hour of private distress, he approves himself, and triumphs, albeit with tears.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Jephthah is deeply impressed with the extraordinary nature of the call he has received. For it is only because he is humble, that he is called. Gideon, in his slight estimate of himself, asks of God to show him miraculous signs on such objects as he points out. Jephthah, regarding the undertaking as great and himself as small, would fain give to God whatever He himself shall elect. His vow is the offspring of his humility. It is pressed out of him by the extraordinary calling which is imposed upon him. His love values nothing so highly, that he should not leave it to God to decide what shall be given up; but the will of God often goes sorely against the heart.

So deeply, also, does every truly humble man feel his calling as Christian and as citizen. "It is difficult to be a Christian," says the heart, terrified at itself. And yet, for him who has been redeemed through penitence and faith, it is so easy. He only would give all, who knows that he must receive all. But the love of the soul that gives itself up, is stronger than its own strength. No true vow is made to the Lord without self-crucifixion. God's ways are incomprehensible. Whom He loves, He chastens. We are ready to give Him everything; but when He takes, we weep. A broken heart is more pleasing to Him than sacrifice. No Passion, no Gospel.

GERLACH: The design of this history (concerning the vow) is not so much to set forth the rudeness of the age, or the dangers of rashly made vows, as rather to show how Israel was saved from its enemies by the faith of Jephthah, and how the service of the true God was restored under the heaviest sacrifices of the faithful.

CHAPTER XI. 34-40.

34 And Jephthah came to Mizpeh [Mizpah] unto his house, and behold, his daughter came [comes] out to meet him with timbrels and with dances: and she was his 35 only child; beside her<sup>1</sup> he had neither son nor daughter. And it came to pass, when he saw her, that he rent his clothes, and said, Alas, my daughter! thou hast brought [thou bringest] me very low, and thou art one of them [the only one]<sup>2</sup> that trouble [afflicteth] me: for I have opened my mouth unto the Lord [Jehovah], 36 and I cannot go back. And she said unto him, My father, if [omit: if] thou hast [hast thou] opened thy mouth unto the Lord [Jehovah], [then] do to me according to that which hath proceeded out of thy mouth; forasmuch as the Lord [Jehovah] hath taken<sup>3</sup> vengeance for thee of thine enemies, even of the children [sons] of Ammon. And she said unto her father, Let this thing be done for [to] me:<sup>4</sup> Let me alone two months, that I may go up and down [may go and descend]<sup>5</sup> upon the mountains, and bewail [weep over] my virginity, I and my fellows [companions]. And he said, Go. And he sent her away [dismissed her] for two months: and she went with her companions, and bewailed [wept over] her virginity upon the mountains. And it came to pass at the end of two months, that she returned unto her father, who did with her according to his vow which he had 40 vowed: and she knew no man. And it was [became] a custom in Israel, That the daughters of Israel went yearly to lament [praise] the daughter of Jephthah the Gileadite four days in a [the] year.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 34. — בְּמִצְפֶּה, for בְּמִצְפָּה, because the neutral conception "child" floats before the writer's mind, cf. Bertheau. The explanation of בְּמִצְפָּה by ex se, implying that Jephthah, though he had no other child of his own, had step-children, would, as Bertheau says, be "unworthy of mention," were it not suggested in the margin of the E. V. — Ta.]

[2 Ver. 35. — תְּחִילָתִי בְּעַלְמֵי אֲפִלְתִּי might be rendered: "thou art among those who afflict me." But the ב is probably the so-called ב essentia (Kell), and simply ascribes the characteristic of a class to the daughter (cf. Ges. Gram. 154, 3, a). Dr. Cassel's "only" is not expressed in the original, but is readily suggested by the contrast of the sad scene with all the other relations of the moment. — Ta.]

[3 Ver. 36. — וַיִּשָּׁע, lit. "dode," with evident reference to the same word used just before: "do, since Jehovah hath done," cf. the Commentary. — Ta.]

[4 Ver. 37. — Dr. Cassel makes this clause refer to the fulfillment of the vow, and renders: "Let this thing be done unto me, only let me alone two months," etc. But it clearly introduces the request for a brief period of delay, and is rightly rendered by the E. V., with which Bertheau, Kell, De Wette agree, cf. the Commentary. — Ta.]

[5 Ver. 37. — וַיֵּרֶד וַיַּעֲלֶה, "descend," i. e. from the elevated situation of Mizpah (cf. on vers. 29, 33), to the neighboring lower hills and valleys (Kell). וַיֵּרֶד does not mean to "wander up and down," a rendering suggested only by the apparent incongruity of "descending" upon the "mountains." — Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Vers. 34-36. And behold, his daughter comes out to meet him. A great victory had been gained. The national enemy was thoroughly subdued. All Gilead was in a joyful uproar. The return of the victorious hero is a triumphal progress; but when he approaches his home, his vow receives a most painful and unexpected definition. "It shall be God's, and not belong to the victor" — so runs the vow — "whatsoever comes out of my house to meet me." And here is his daughter coming towards him, with tambourines and choral dances, to celebrate her father's victory! He sees her, and is struck with horror. It is his only child; and his vow tears her from his arms, and makes him childless. Broad as his vow was, he never thought that he could, even if he would, include her in it. This again appears from the circumstance, already adverted to, that the victory and the vow are against Ammon. The heathen promised or sacrificed their first-born sons. According to the Mosaic law, also, the first-born males (זָכָרִים) belong to God. The same law permitted only male<sup>1</sup> victims to be presented as

sions there made. Jephthah proposes a whole burnt-offering — spiritual indeed so far as its possible human subjects are concerned, but still bound by the law of whole burnt-offering.]

whole burnt-offerings (Lev. i. 3). Jephthah's design was to testify that he gave himself up to his God as entirely as the Ammonites imagined themselves to do to their idols. He would have consecrated his first-born son to God — Abraham's child, also, was a boy, — but he had none. Hence, he expresses his self-renunciation in the form of a vow, in which he leaves it to God to select whatever should be most precious in his eyes. But of his daughter he did not think. It never even occurred to him that she might come forth to meet him; for that was usually done only by women<sup>1</sup> (נָשִׁים). Ex. xv. 20; 1 Sam. xviii. 6), not by maidens, who remained within the house; and Jephthah's daughter was yet a בְּתוּלָה, virgin. But this daughter was worthy of her father. The victory was so great, that she breaks through the restraints of custom, and, like Miriam (the same terms are used here as on the occasion of Moses' song of victory, Ex. xv. 20), goes forth to meet the conqueror. As soon as Jephthah sees her, he recognizes the will of God. His vow is accepted; but comprehensive as he consciously made it, it is God who now first interprets it for him in all its fullness. The hero had made the vow in this indefinite form, because he had no only and dearly loved son like Isaac. True, he had a daughter; but he deemed himself debarred from consecrating her, and therefore makes his vow. God now teaches him that he looks not at the sex of the consecrated, but at the heart of the consecrator. However comprehensive Jephthah's vow, without his daughter it would at most have cost him money or property, but his heart would have offered no sacrifice. God teaches him that He delights not in he-goats and oxen;<sup>2</sup> that that which pleases Him is a broken heart. His heart breaks within him, when he sees his daughter. She is his darling, his sole ornament, the light of his house, the jewel of his heart; and from her he must separate. He comes home the greatest in Israel; he now feels himself the poorest. But he perceives that this is the real fulfillment of his vow; that God cares not for money or property. The highest offering, which God values, is a chastened heart. Obedience is better than sacrifice. The life is not in the letter: every contract with God must be kept in the spirit. Jephthah's faith revealed itself before the battle. That God was with him, was proved by his victory. But his entire self-surrender to God approves itself still more beautifully after the battle. For he conquers himself. He bowed himself reverently before God, before the decision was given; but his deepest piety manifests itself afterwards. He gives his own people, he gives Ammon and Moab, an instance of the power of an Israelite to perform the vows he has made. He suffers his vow to bind him, but does not attempt to bind it. He interprets it, not according to the letter, but the spirit. Lev. xxvii. 4, 5 prescribes the way in which a woman, concerning whom a vow has been made, is to be redeemed. But his only little daughter, who comes to meet him, he cannot protect. Since God leads her forth towards him, He cannot intend an offering of ten shekels (Lev. xxvii. 5). His pious soul does not take refuge behind external formulæ; as we read in connection with heathen vows and bad promises.<sup>3</sup> He recognizes the fact that, since his only, dearly loved child comes to meet him, God demands of him all the love which he cherishes for her, and all the pain which it will cost him to part with her. And in this conviction, he hesitates not for an instant. He believes like Abraham; and, like him, albeit with a bleeding heart, makes full surrender of what God requires.

The scene of Jephthah's meeting with his daughter has no equal in pathetic power. Her we see advancing with a radiant face, giving voice to her jubilant heart, surrounded by dancing companions, and longing to hear her father's happy greeting; while he, in the midst of sounding timbrels and triumphant shouts — hides his face for agony! What might have been a moment of loudest jubilation, is become one of the deepest sorrow. That on which his imagination had fondly dwelt as the crowning point of his joy — the honor with which he could encircle the head of his only child, his virgin-daughter, now the first in all the nation — was instantly transformed into the heaviest woe. "O my daughter, deeply hast thou caused me to bow, and thou alone distressest me." He borrows the words perhaps from the panegyric song in which she celebrates him as "having caused the enemy to kneel,"<sup>4</sup> and to be distressed; and in the extremity of his grief applies them to his child, thus suddenly astonished and struck dumb in the midst of her joy. "But," continues the hero, though his heart weeps, "I have opened my mouth unto Jehovah, and I cannot go back." I promised God in the spirit of sincerity, and must perform it in the same spirit. And there is not in antiquity, no, nor yet in Holy Scripture, an instance of a maiden uttering a more beautiful, more profoundly pathetic word, than that which Jephthah's daughter, a hero's daughter, a true child of Israel, speaks to her father, even while as yet she knows not the purport of the vow: "Hast thou opened thy mouth to Jehovah, then do according to that which proceeded out of thy mouth; for Jehovah also hath done according to thy word, and hath taken vengeance on thy enemies." She neither deprecates nor laments, gives no start, exhibits no despair — does nothing to make her father waver; but, on the contrary, encourages him, refers him to what God has done, and bids him do as he has promised, not to think, as he might perhaps be tempted to do, of change or modification in her from a heathen point of view, not only by such examples as that of Iphigenia (cf. Cicero, de Officiis, ii. 96), and of Curtius in Rome, but also by that of Anchurus, the son of the Phrygian king Midas, who deemed his own life the most precious sacrifice that could be offered from his father's possessions to the gods. But in reality, these exhibit only the principles that underlie the practice of human sacrifices — principles, with which the spirit of the Scriptures, and their spiritual modes of conception, stand strongly in contrast.

favor. Such is the delicacy and tenderness of the narrative, that the modes of thought and feeling characteristic of this heroic daughter, as such, stand out in full relief; for it is in true womanly style that she says to her father: "Since Jehovah hath taken vengeance of thine enemies." The utterance is altogether personal, as her womanly interest was personal. She concentrates the national victory in that of her father; the national enemy in the enemies of her father. God has given him vengeance (נִקְמָה); consequently he is bound, personally, to give to God what he has promised.

Vers. 37-40. And she said to her father, Let this thing be done to me. The noble maiden may boldly take her place by the side of Isaac, who, according to the narrative in Genesis, was not aware of the sacrifice to which he was destined. She gives herself up to her father, freely and joyfully, to be dealt with as his vow demanded. Heathen antiquity, also, has similar instances of virgins voluntarily offering themselves up for their native land. But comparison will point out the difference between them and the case of Jephthah's daughter, and will help to show that here there can be no thought of a literal sacrifice of life. Pausanias (i. 32) relates the legend, dramatically treated by Euripides, that when the Athenians, who harbored the descendants of Hercules, were at war with the Peloponnesians, an oracle declared the voluntary death of one of those descendants to be necessary in order to secure victory to the Athenians; whereupon Macaria killed herself. — When the Thebans were waging war with the Orchomenians, the oracle advised them, that, if they were to conquer, their most distinguished fellow-citizen must sacrifice himself (Paus. ix. 17). Antipæus, who is this most distinguished citizen, despises the oracle; his daughters, on the contrary, honor it, and devote themselves to death. — In the war of Erechtheus with Eumolpus, the oracle required of the former the sacrifice of his daughters. They voluntarily killed themselves (Apoll. iii. 15, 11; cf. Heyne on the passage). The same thing is told of Marius by Plutarch. Defeated by the Cimbrians, a divine oracle informed him that he would conquer, if he offered up his daughter, which he did. In all these legends, which might be greatly multiplied, an oracle commands the virgin-sacrifice; in all of them, a vigorous, superstitious belief in the atoning efficacy of pure blood, such as appears in the German legend of Poor Heinrich, is the underlying motive; in all of them, also, the virgin-sacrifice forms the preliminary condition of victory. But in the history of Jephthah all this is changed. Jephthah makes a vow, but does not think of his daughter. In his case, the vow is a recognition of the fact that victory belongs, not to men, but to God. He makes a vow, although God has not required one. He keeps it, even after victory, although the extent of the sacrifice had not been anticipated. Neither he nor his daughter think of evasions, such, e. g., as Pausanias (iv. 9) speaks of in connection with similar histories in Messenia. And yet, the offering which each of them brings is as trying as death would be, although it cannot actually involve death. For that point is decided, not only by the different statements of the history itself, but especially by the fact that the offering is made to Jehovah, who, even when, as in the case of Abraham, he himself requires a sacrifice, will not suffer obedience to consummate itself in deeds of blood.

Let me alone two months, that I may go and descend upon the mountains, and weep over my virginity, I and my companions. No equivocal intimation is here given of the fate which befell the daughter of Jephthah. She was still in her father's house, an only daughter, not yet married. Since the vow touches her, and devotes her entirely as an offering to God, she must belong to no one else, consequently not to her father, nor to a husband. She cannot be married, and will never rejoice over children. That is Jephthah's sorrow

— his house is withered away (יָצַרְיָהּ), his family disappears. The highest happiness in Israel, to have children, and thus to see one's name or house continued, will not be his. The dearest of all beings, his only child, is dead to him. The same sorrow, and in accordance with ancient feelings with even greater severity, if that were possible, falls on the virgin daughter herself. An unmarried life was equivalent to death for the maidens of ancient Israel. For the bud withers away. Conjugal love and duty, the blossoms of life, do not appear. Unmarried maidens have no place in the life of the state. Marriage forms the crown of normal family life. The psalm (lxxviii. 63) notes it as part of the utmost popular misery, that "the fire (of war) consumes the young men, and the maidens are not celebrated" (in marriage songs). Analogous sentiments are frequent in the life of ancient nations. The Brahminism of India looks upon a childless condition as in the highest degree disgraceful. A woman is always in need of manly guidance and protection; be it as daughter from her father, as wife from her husband, or as mother from her sons (cf. Bohlen, Altes Indien, ii. 141 ff.). The laws of Lycurgus concerning marriage, and their penalties against men who did not marry, are familiar. Noteworthy, with reference to the customs of Asia Minor, is an episode in the history of Polycrates, the tyrant of Samos. Being urgently warned by his daughter against leaving his island to go to Oroetus, who was on the continent, he became angry, and threatened her, that in case of his safe return home, she should long afterwards continue to be a virgin; to which the dutiful daughter replied, that she would gladly remain virgin much longer still, if only she did not lose her father (Herod. iii. 124).

And weep over my virginity. Not, then, it appears, to mourn her own untimely death. If she was to die, it would have been unnatural to ask for a space of two months to be spent on the mountains in weeping. In that case, why depart with her maiden companions? why not remain at home with her father? A person expecting death and ready for it, would ask no time for lamentation. Such a one dies, and is lamented by others. But Jephthah's daughter is to live — a virgin life, to which no honor is paid, from which no blossoms spring — a life of stillness and seclusion. No nuptial song shall praise, no husband honor, no child grace her. This weeping of virgins,<sup>1</sup> because they remain without the praise of wedlock, is characteristic of the naïve manners and candid, unaffected purity of ancient life through wide-extended circles. Sophocles, in "King Œdipus" (ver. 1504), makes the father express his fears that "age will consume his children, fruitless and unmarried."

it was customary to do in pathetic and elegiac terms. Wenzig, West-Slav. Märchenalt., pp. 18, 311.

Electra, in the tragedy which bears her name, says of Chrysothemis (ver. 962 f.): "Well mayest thou lament that thou must grow old so long in unmarried joylessness;" just as she is herself commiserated by Orestes (ver. 1185): "Oh, the years of unmarried, anxious life which thou hast lived." In many other instances of virgins who must die or have died, the fact of their dying unmarried is lamented. So, for example, in the beautiful inscription of the Anthology (cf. Herder, Werke, xx. 73): "Dear daughter, thou wentest so early, and ere I adorned thy bridal couch, down to the yellow stream under the shades;" and in the plaint of Polyxena (Euripides, Hecuba, ver. 414): "Unmarried, without nuptial song, which nevertheless is my due." The daughter of Jephthah laments not that she must die as a virgin, but with her maiden companions bewails her virginity itself.

From year to year the daughters of Israel go to celebrate in songs (לְהַנְחִיף, cf. ch. v. 11) the daughter of Jephthah. Of this festival<sup>1</sup> nothing further is known. A reflection of the feelings it expressed might, however, be found in very ancient analogies. After the maiden, with her companions, has wept on the mountains for two months, over the vain promise of her youth, she returns to her father. The mountains are the abode of a pure and elevated solitude, in which her own chaste heart and those of her companions can open themselves without being overheard. On mountains, also, and in unfrequented pasture-lands and forests, abode the Greek Artemis, the virgin who goes about alone, without companions, like the moon in the sky. It was on account of this her virginity, that Greek maidens celebrated her in many places with song and dance; from which practice she derived the name Artemis Hymnia, especially current in the mountains of Arcadia. The hymns were sung by virgin-choirs (cf. Welcker, Griech. Mythol. i. 585). A similar festival was devoted to Artemis on Mount Taygetus. At Caryæ, also in Laconia, festive choral dances were yearly executed in her honor (Paus. iii. 10). The virgin goddess was also called Hecæerge (Ἑκαέργη), and Opis or Oupis (Ὀπίς or Ὀυπίς). Ὀυρίγγος is the song of praise, with which, especially in Delos, and in accordance with peculiar myths, virgins celebrated the chaste Oupis, and brought her, as soon as they married, a lock of their hair (Callim. in Del. ver. 292; Paus. i. 43). The same custom was observed at Megara with reference to Iphinoë, who died a virgin. (Paus. i. 43). Here also tradition leads us back to Artemis, who is styled protectress of her father. That it is the attributes of chastity and virginity which are thus celebrated, is indicated by the transfer of the custom in honor of a man, in the legend of Hippolytus. "Him," Euripides makes Artemis say, "shall virgins ever praise in lyric songs;" and locks of hair were dedicated to him by Troezenian brides (cf. Euripides, Hippol. ver. 1425; Paus. ii. 32).

These observances are a reflection of the narrative concerning Jephthah's daughter, for the reason that they present us with virgin festivals, and with songs to the goddess who did not die, but remained a virgin. In point of fact, the existence of such festivals points to conceptions of life under whose influence woman, contrary to the common rule, lived in a state of virginity. The circumstance, also, that it became a custom in Israel to "praise" the daughter of Jephthah four days in every year, is itself a proof that the practice did not refer to a maiden who had been put to death. For what would there have been to praise in what was not necessarily dependent on her own free will? As in Artemis, so in her, it is voluntary, self-guarded chastity that is praised, just as Hippolytus also is not celebrated because he died unmarried, but because his life fell a sacrifice to his virtuous continence.

And he did with her according to his vow, and she knew no man. Had she been put to death, that fact must have been indicated in some way. The narrator would have said, "and he presented her as a sacrifice at the altar in Mizpah," or, "and she died, having known no man," or some other similar formula. At all events, it does not "stand there in the text," as Luther wrote, that she was offered in sacrifice. Much rather does this sentence show the contrary. For its second clause is explanatory of the nature and purport of the vow as it was fulfilled. The end to which it looked was the very thing which it is stated was actually secured, that she should know no man.<sup>2</sup> On any other interpretation, the addition of this clause would be inexplicable and questionable. For the fact that she was a virgin in her father's house, has already been twice brought forward. Moreover, it is surely not an event of very rare occurrence, for young women to die before they are married. And why should the narrator have hesitated to speak of the transaction in such terms as properly and plainly described it? In other cases he does not fail to speak of the most fearful aberrations just as they are. The truth is, the whole narrative derives its mighty charm only from the mysterious, and at that time in Israel very extraordinary fact, that the daughter of the great hero, for whom a life of brilliant happiness opened itself, spent her days in solitude and virginity.<sup>3</sup> Death, even unnatural, was nothing un-

<sup>2</sup> Hengstenberg, in his valuable essay on Jephthah's vow (Pentateuch, ii. 105 ff.), seeks to explain the daughter's destiny by means of an institute of holy women, into which she perhaps entered. This is not the place to treat that subject, which must be referred to 1 Sam. ii. 22. This much only seems to me to be certain, that by the מְנַחֲמִי, Ex. xxxviii. 8 and 1 Sam. ii. 22, we are not to understand ministering women. It must be remarked, in general, that the fundamental signification of מְנַחֲמִי is, not militaire, but "to be in a multitude." From this the idea of the מְנַחֲמִי, the hosts, in heaven and on earth, is derived. מְנַחֲמִי derives its meaning "host," not from military discipline, but from the assembling of a multitude at one place.

The women of the passages alluded to are therefore not ministering women, but persons who collected together at the tabernacle for purposes of prayer, requests, and thanksgiving, like the wives of Elkanaah (1 Sam. i.), or to consult with and inquire of the priests. Some, of course, were more instant and continuous in their attendance than others (cf. Kimchi on 1 Sam. ii. 22). At all events, they were women who were either married or widowed. But the history of Jephthah's daughter is related as something extraordinary. Her virginity must remain intact. On this account she is lamented, and a festival is celebrated for her sake. These are uncommon matters, not to be harmonized with the idea of a familiarly known institute. Even among the Talmudists, a sefa ascetic is a phenomenon unheard of and unapproved (Sota, 2a).

<sup>3</sup> Nor is it necessary to assume anything more to explain the lament of the daughter or the grief of the bereaved father. Even Roman fathers took it sorrowfully, when their daughters became vestal virgins, notwithstanding the great common. But a life such as Jephthah's daughter henceforth lived, was at that time unparalleled in Israel, and affords therefore profound instruction, not to be overlooked because issuing from the silence of retirement.

Jephthah performs his vow. That which comes to meet him, even when it proves to be his daughter, he consecrates entirely to God, as a true offering of righteousness (cf. Ps. li. 21: וְהִנֵּה עֹלָה וְקָלִיל). He fulfills his vow so fully as to put it beyond his own reach to annul or commute its purport. For he fulfills, as he vowed, voluntarily; no one called on him to make his promise good. The background of the history, without which it cannot be understood, is life in and with God. The providence to which the hero commits the definition of his vow, is that of Jehovah. And if God leads his daughter forth to meet him, and thus in her receives the highest object in the gift of Jephthah, the consecration of which she becomes the subject cannot be of a nature opposed to God.

The event throws a brightness over the life of perpetual virginity which rescues it from ignominy and dishonor. Jephthah's daughter typically exemplifies the truth that a virgin life, if it be consecrated to God, is not such an utter abnormality, as until then it had appeared. In Jephthah's fulfillment of his vow and the consequent unmarried life of his daughter, there is a foreshadowing of those evangelical thoughts by means of which the Apostle liberates woman from the dread of remaining unwedded. Not, however, that we are to look here for the germ or type of the nunnery system;<sup>1</sup> but for an example of belonging wholly to God, and of living unmarried, without being burdened or placed in a false position.

That Jephthah through his vow became the occasion of such an example, is already some mitigation of his fate. He has become the father, not of children who inherited his house, but of countless virgins who learned from his daughter to remain free and wholly devoted to God. Jephthah is a truly tragic hero. His youth endures persecution. His strength grows in exile. His victory and fame veil themselves in desolation when his only daughter leaves his home. But everywhere he is great. Whatever befalls, he comes out conqueror at last. God is always the object of his faith. He suffers more than Gideon; but what he does at last does not become a snare to Israel. He also had no successors in his office of wisdom and heroism; — just as Gideon, and Samson, and Samuel had none; but it was not his fault that he had them not. His daughter, who resembled a Miriam, gave herself up to God.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>2</sup> Poets, unfortunately, have almost without exception considered a sacrificial death more poetical, and have thus done serious injustice to the memory of Jephthah. It was done, among others, by Dante (Paradise, v. 68), who herein

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Jephthah's call was extraordinary: extraordinary also is the manner of his own endurance and his daughter's obedience. He parts with her, though deeply afflicted. He yields, though possessed of secular power. His daughter comforts him, though herself the greatest loser. Isaac did not know that he was to be the sacrifice; but Jephthah's daughter knows it, and is content.

1. Thus it appears that a child who loves its father, can also love God. In true devotion of children to parents, there lies a germ of the like relation to God. The daughter of Jephthah loves her father so dearly, that for his sake she calmly submits to that which he has vowed to God. It is written: Honor thy father and mother, that thy days may be long in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee. To Jephthah's daughter this was fulfilled in the spirit. Her memory has never faded from the books of Israel, nor from the heaven of God, where all sorrows are redeemed.

2. Jephthah might have conquered without a vow; but having vowed before his victory, he fulfills it after the same. Faithfulness to his word is man's greatest wisdom, even though he moisten it with tears. Faithfulness towards a sin is inconceivable; because unfaithfulness lies in the nature of sin. Faithfulness has the promise: be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee the crown of life.

3. Jephthah's daughter does not die like one sacrificed to Molech: she dies to the world. She loses a thousand joys that are sweet as love. But no one ever dies to the world and lives to God, without experiencing sorrow. A virgin life is a nameless life, as Jephthah's daughter is nameless in Scripture. But the happiness of this world is not indispensable; and like the solitary flower, the unmarried woman can belong to her God, in whose heaven they neither give nor are given in marriage.

GERLACH: That the Judges whom God raised up, when they thus offered to the Lord even that which they held most dear, did not deliver the estranged and deeply fallen people in a merely outward sense, is shown by this act of believing surrender.

followed the Catholic exegesis of his day (cf. my article in Herzog, p. 470). To be sure, Herder did the same. Lord Byron also, in his Hebrew Melodies (see a translation of his poems in Klein's Volkskalender, for 1854, p. 47). The names in Händel's Oratorio seem to have been borrowed from the poem of Buchanan, published in Strasburg, 1568. Cf. Gideke, Pamphilus Gengenbach, p. 672. In Faber's Historischer Lustgarten (Augsburg and Frankfurt, 1702), the daughter is called "Jephthina."

CHAPTER XII. 1-7.

1 And the men of Ephraim gathered themselves together, and went northward [proceeded to Zaphon], and said unto Jephthah, Wherefore passedst thou over [Why

- didst thou pass on — proceed —] to fight against the children [sons] of Ammon, and 2 didst not call us to go with thee? we will burn thine house upon thee with fire. And Jephthah said unto them, I and my people were at great strife [in a severe conflict] with the children [sons] of Ammon; and when [omit: when] I called you, [and] ye 3 delivered me not out of their hands [hand]. And when I saw that ye delivered me not, I put my life in my hands [hand], and passed over [on] against the children [sons] of Ammon, and the Lord [Jehovah] delivered them into my hand: where-4 fore then are ye come up unto me this day, to fight against me? Then [And] Jephthah gathered together all the men of Gilead, and fought with Ephraim: and the men of Gilead smote Ephraim, because they [had] said, ye Gileadites are fugitives of Ephraim among the Ephraimites, and among the Manassites [fugitives of 5 Ephraim are ye Gilead, in Ephraim and Manasseh]. And the Gileadites took the passages [fords] of [the] Jordan before the Ephraimites [toward Ephraim]: and it was so, that when those Ephraimites which were escaped [the fugitives of Ephraim], said, Let me go over; that the men of Gilead said unto him, Art thou an Ephraimite?
 6 If he said, Nay; Then said they unto him, Say now Shibboleth: and he said Sibboleth:
 for he could not<sup>1</sup> frame to pronounce it right. Then they took him and slew [slaughtered] him at the passages [fords] of [the] Jordan. And there fell at that time of the 7 Ephraimites forty and two thousand. And Jephthah judged Israel six years: then died Jephthah the Gileadite, and was buried in one of the cities of Gilead.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 6. — "Could not," is too strong. KELL: "יִשְׁבֹּלֵת, stands elliptically for לֵב יִשְׁבֹּלֵת, to apply the mind, to give heed. Cf. 1 Sam. xxiii. 22; 1 Chr. xxviii. 2, with 2 Chr. xli. 14; xxx. 19." — TR.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

The victory of Jephthah is followed by a repetition of what took place after Gideon's heroic achievement. The overhearing pride of the chief tribe, Ephraim, vents itself in each instance against the victor who has risen up within the smaller tribe, and has become the saviour of the people. Now as then the presumptuous jealousy of the tribe complains that it has not been invited to take part. But this apparent eagerness for war was hypocritical. The thing really desired was a share in the booty and the results of success. Ephraim would help to reap, where it had not sown. The injustice of the tribe was even greater on this occasion than in the time of Gideon. For then it really did render some little assistance, albeit only after Gideon had first led the way. But here it had been called on for help, and had stayed at home. As soon, however, as victory had been obtained, it came with threats and war. But it was not so successful now as with Gideon. That hero, when they clamored against him, was still in pursuit of the enemy, and was obliged, for the sake of his own success, to allay their pride and presumption by gentleness. Jephthah had no reason for submitting to such arrogance. Nor did the Ephraimites come with words only; they were prepared to use force. They derided the people, and thought that with arms in their hands they could chastise Gilead and humble Jephthah. They will set his house on fire over his head. Then Jephthah shows that he is not only a hero against enemies, but also the Judge in Israel. It is his authority which he tries and proves by chastising Ephraim. But here also, as in his dealings with the sons of Ammon, he first establishes the righteousness of his conduct by clear words. However, if sinful Ephraim had cared for righteousness, it would in no case have entered on this course. It relied on violence, like Ammon; and like Ammon it experienced the chastisement of violence. No Judge of whom the history tells us inflicts such chastisement and exercises such power within the nation as well as against alien enemies, as does Jephthah. But it was needed; and the humiliation of Ephraim for its sin was less severe than it might otherwise have proved, because the punishment came in the time of Israel's freedom, and not at the expense of that freedom.

Ver. 1. And proceeded to Zaphon. The older Jewish expositors, whom Ewald and Keil have followed, already found in צִפְוֹן, not direction toward the north, but the name of a city, which lay beyond the Jordan in the tribe of Gad (Josh. xiii. 27). This interpretation rests on the requirements of the context. For in order to explain verses 4 and 5, Ephraim must have advanced across the Jordan. The remark in the Jerusalem Talmud (Shviith, 9, 2), which identifies Zaphon with עֲמָתוֹ, Amathus, Aemath, cf. Amateh (cf. Ritter, xv. 1031), is therefore altogether suitable. For this city was still known in later times as a strong point on the Jordan, as Josephus repeatedly states. The Onomasticon, also (ed. Parthey, p. 26), says concerning it, that it lay beyond the Jordan, to the south of Pella; for Ritter's oversight, who supposes that the Onomasticon identifies Amathus with another Aemath in the tribe of Reuben, is not to be concurred in. Amathus, according to its stated distance from Pella (in vigesimo primo milliario), could not lie in the tribe of Reuben — which agrees so far with the fact that Zaphon was in Gad.

Ver. 2. And Jephthah said unto them. It was not related above that Jephthah called on the tribe of Ephraim to assist, as he here reminds them; but that he would do so, was to be expected. But even if he had not done so, what was there to justify Ephraim in its contention and war? Jephthah's answer is not defiant: it allows that Gilead would gladly have accepted help, if only a helper had been at hand. Jephthah would gladly have yielded the precedence in victory to Ephraim, if Ephraim had only wielded arms against the enemy as bravely as it now uses words against its brethren. But when he saw that there was no deliverer, he put his life in his hand, and God gave the victory. Did not Jephthah devote his dearest possession in order to obtain from God the victory for which he entreated Him?

The Midrash has a thought in this connection, which, when disengaged from its unhistorical wrappings, is judicious and profound. It says that for the things which befell Israel under Jephthah only the priests were to blame. Why did they not annul the vow of Jephthah! Why did they not restrain Ephraim from civil war! It is manifest that a truth is here suggested which applies to all times. It is undoubtedly the duty of persons equipped with spiritual power, to lift up their voices for peace, and especially to labor for concord between the single tribe and all Israel. If they neglect this duty, their candlestick — this also the Midrash intimates — will sooner or later be overthrown.

Ver. 3. Wherefore then are ye come up unto me this day to fight against me? Ephraim's attempt is actually more culpable than Ammon's. In itself considered, civil war between cognate tribes is a disgrace, which can only spring from ungodliness. But the sin of Ephraim, when it proposes to burn the house of Jephthah, is still further aggravated by the fact that it is directed against the restorer of the divine law and the deliverer of Israel. It is moral and national treason. The Spartans also, under all sorts of pretexts, had left Athens to face alone the advancing Persians. But when the battle at Marathon had been won, the auxiliary troops who arrived too late to be of service, praised and applauded the heroism of Athens (Herod. vi. 120). Jephthah dwells on the injustice of Ephraim, who would not indeed fight against Ammon, but now ("this day") undertakes to make war on him (he always stands personally for his people), in order to excuse his armed resistance. Ephraim now receives the punishment which properly it had already deserved at Gideon's hands. It is totally defeated by the hero; and its men find themselves entered on a calamitous flight.

Vers. 4, 5. And the men of Gilead smote Ephraim. It was not Jephthah, as the fine representation gives us to remark, who prosecuted the bloody pursuit. He contented himself with chastising Ephraim according to its presumption; but the people of Gilead had been exasperated by the contempt of the Ephraimites. It is true that the sentence in which the ground of the wrath of the Gileadites over an utterance of the Ephraimites is expressed, is not easily expounded: כִּי אָמְרוּ פְּלִיטֵי אֶפְרַיִם הֵמָּה גִּלְעָד בְּרוּחַ אֶפְרַיִם. For it is not at once apparent how the Gileadites could be called "fugitives of Ephraim," seeing they were descendants of Manasseh. A closer inspection, however, makes this intelligible. Ephraim raised a claim to participate in war, only in the cases of Gideon and Jephthah, not in those of the other Judges. It is manifest, therefore, that it based its claim upon the fact that Gideon and Jephthah belonged to Manasseh, its own sister-tribe. At any rate, the House of Joseph, Ephraim and Manasseh, had from of old a consciousness of a certain unity of its own. It treated as one with Joshua (Josh. xvii. 14 ff.). It entered together into its territory (Judg. i. 22). Under king Solomon it was under a common administrative officer (1 Kgs. xi. 28). Now, in the "House of Joseph" Ephraim had the chief voice; for Manasseh was divided, and its possessions lay scattered among other tribes. Hence, it could with some plausibility claim it as its right that no division of the House of Joseph should undertake a warlike expedition without its participation. Nor do Gideon and Jephthah deny this right. "We did call thee," says the latter; "but thou didst not come." Only the manner in which Ephraim raised its claim was sinful, unjust, and arrogant. For it raised it, not in the time of distress, but for the sake of the booty; and instead of applauding a great achievement, it indulged in derision, which exasperated the warriors of Gilead. For in storming at Jephthah for not calling it, it denies to Gilead every right of separate action. "How can Gilead presume to exercise tribal functions, and set a prince and judge over Israel?" "Gilead is no community at all," but only a "set of fugitives," who act as if they were a tribe, whereas in fact they belong elsewhere. They use the word peletim (fugitives) by way of contumely, just as among the Greeks φυγῆς meant both fugitive and banished. Ye are "fugitives of Ephraim," taunted the Ephraimites, and would set yourselves up as an independent principality. In so saying, Ephraim arrogantly put itself in the place of the House of Joseph, to which Gilead also belonged, since it was the son of Machir of Manasseh. "Gilead belongs in the midst of Ephraim and Manasseh." This addition was intended to add point to what preceded. Gilead is nothing by itself, has no tribal rights; it belongs to the House of Joseph. This was true, indeed; and Gilead's descendants lived on both sides of the river (Num. xxvi. 30 ff.); but "fugitives" they were not. The half-tribe of Manasseh beyond the Jordan was as independent as any other tribe; and in the war against Ammon Gilead proper was doubtless joined by men of other tribes, especially Gad. It was therefore no wonder that the men of Gilead became greatly exasperated, and did not spare the Ephraimites even in their flight. Jephthah only defeated them; but the multitude slew them like enemies, and gave no quarter. Thus, sin and contumely beget passion and cruelty. The discord of brethren inflicts the deepest wounds. Nowhere does hatred rise higher, than where concord is natural.

Ver. 6. Then said they to him, Say Shibboleth. Ephraim meets with remarkable experiences at the fords of the Jordan. In Gideon's time, it gained easy victory there over the Midianites whom that hero chased into their hands; now it is itself chased thither and there put to death. In the outset, its men had taunted Gilead with the term "fugitives of Ephraim," and now they are themselves in very truth פְּלִיטֵי אֶפְרַיִם. Before, they prided themselves upon their tribe name Ephraim, which they haughtily used for the whole House of Joseph; and now, when an Ephraimite came to the stream, he is fain to deny his tribe in order to save his life. The enraged men of Gilead will not suffer one Ephraimite to cross the river; hence the requisition of every one who wished to pass over, to say Shibboleth, which no Ephraimite could do, for he could only say Sibboleth. What "Shibboleth" meant, is of minor importance; but as its enunciation was required at the river, and in order to pass it, it may be assumed that the Gileadites thought rather of the signification "stream" than "ear," both of which the word has. Every Ephraimite in this extremity had the feeling afterwards depicted in the Psalm (lxi. 3 [2]): "I am come into depths of waters, and the stream overflows me," וַיִּשְׁבֹּת שְׁטַף־הַיָּם. — When, during the Flemish war, the insurrection against the French broke out, May 25, 1302, the gates were guarded, and no one was suffered to pass out, except such as were able to say, "Scilt ende friend," which words no Frenchman could pronounce. (Mensel, Gesch. von Frankr. ii. 134; Schmidt, Gesch. von Frankr. i. 682).

And there fell at that time of the Ephraimites forty and two thousand. The number 42 (7 times 6) appears to be not far removed from a round number; but its occurrence is associated with severe and well-merited judgments on sin. As here 42,000 sinful Ephraimites fall, so 42 of the mockers of the prophet Elijah are killed by bears (2 Kgs. ii. 24); and when the judgment of God breaks forth over the house of Ahab, 42 brethren of Ahaziah are put to death by Jehu (2 Kgs. x. 14).

Ver. 7. And he was buried in one of the cities of Gilead. Herein the mournful lot of Jephthah, resulting from the surrender of his daughter, shows itself. He had no heir, as he had had no inheritance. He was the first and the last in his house. The greatness of his deeds is proved by the fact that they were nevertheless remembered; for in what city he was buried was not known, just as to us Mizpah, the place where he had his home, is also unknown, and as the place of his birth is not mentioned. It is not known what his father's name was; it is not known where his own grave is. "Gilead" begat him, and Gilead received his corpse. He shares no father's tomb, and no son shares his. He was a great hero who lived and died solitary; only faith in God was with him. Six years he ruled; when they were finished, his rest from labor and sorrow began. His name did not return; Gilead's power rose not again; but he was not forgotten in Israel. His sorrow and victory are typical — so the older expositors suggest — of Him who said: "Not my will, but thine, be done!"

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Jephthah's vocation was extraordinary, and equally extraordinary was his fate. He gave up everything to God for his people; and yet at last the envy of his countrymen pursues him. They threaten to burn his house, which for their sake he has made desolate. He makes no boast of this, however; yet exercises discipline with a strong hand. Six years he judged, and in the seventh rested from an office that had brought him so much grief.

1. Prior to success friends are few; but afterwards all wish to share in it. While there is danger, he who takes the lead is called valorous; after the victory, usurper. Sin regards not the offerings which the warrior brings, but only the results which he has obtained. The evil will not assist in sowing; but yet would fain participate in the harvest.

2. Life offers nothing to such as serve not God, even though one rise as high as Jephthah. If

1 [Dr. Wordsworth looks on Jephthah as "one who does mighty deeds in an irregular manner, at a time when those persons who are placed in authority by God, and who ought to employ God's appointed means in a regular way, are faithless to their trust, and neglect their duty to God and his Church. His work may be compared to that of the Wes-

Jephthah had not rebuilt the altar of Jehovah in Israel, he had been happier in the desert and the silence of seclusion. The charm of life must be sought in the gospel. Life is short; and though prolonged, full of trouble. Every religion builds its altar for eternity. For Him who has wrought six days for his Saviour, and confessed Him, there opens on the seventh the Sabbath of eternity.

STARKE: The godly are never long without a cross: they are tried at home and abroad; without is fighting, within is fear (2 Cor. vii. 5). — SAILER: The gospel without suffering belongs to heaven; suffering without the gospel, to hell; the gospel with suffering, to earth.

[HENRY: It is an ill thing to fasten names or characters of reproach on persons or countries, as is common, especially on those who lie under outward disadvantages; it often occasions quarrels of ill consequences, as here. See likewise what a mischievous thing an abusive tongue is. — WORDSWORTH: Here we see a specimen of that evil spirit of envy and pride which has shown itself in the Church of God. They who are in high place in the Church, like Ephraim, sometimes stand aloof in the time of danger. And when others of lower estate have stepped into the gap, and have stood in the breach, and braved the danger, and have fought the battle and gained the victory, as Jephthah the Gileadite did (the man of Gilead, which was not a tribe of Israel), then they are angry and jealous, and insult them with proud words, and even proscribe and taunt them with being runaways and deserters, and yet daring to claim a place among the tribes of Israel. Has not this haughty and bitter language of scorn and disdain been the language of some in the greatest western church of Christendom against the churches of the reformation? Has it not sometimes been the language of some in the Church of England towards separatists from herself? Schism doubtless is a sin; but it is sometimes caused by the enforcement of anti-scriptural terms of communion, as it is by the Church of Rome; and the sin of the schism is hers. It is often occasioned (though not justified) by spiritual languor and lethargy in the Church of God. Zeal for God and for the truth is good wherever it be found. Let the churches of Christ stand forth in the hour of danger and fight boldly the good fight against the Ammonites of error and unbelief. Then the irregular guerrilla warfare of separatist<sup>1</sup> Jephthahs and their Gileadites will be unnecessary, and they will fight side by side under the banner of Ephraim. — THE SAME: The Gileadites did not slay the Ephraimites because they did not agree with them in pronouncement, but because they were Ephraimites, which was discovered by their different pronunciation. The strifes in the Church of God lie deeper than differences of expression in ritual observances or formularies of faith. They lie in the heart, which is depraved by the evil passions of envy, hatred, and malice; and slight differences in externals are often the occasions for eliciting the deep rooted prejudices of depraved will, and the malignant feelings of unsanctified hearts. Let the heart be purified by the Holy Spirit of peace, and the lips will move in harmony and love. — THE SAME: That river which in the days of Joshua leys and Whitefields," etc. see on ch. xi. 1. The definition of "irregularity" here given, applies to all the Judges: In a certain sense, they were all irregular; but that Jephthah was so in any special sense is abundantly refuted by Dr. Cassel's exposition. — Ta.]

had been divided by God's power and mercy, in order that all the tribes might pass over together into Canaan, the type of heaven, is now made the scene of carnage between Gilead and Ephraim. In the Church of God, the scenes of God's dearest love have often been made the scenes of men's bitterest hate. The waters of baptism, the living waters of the Holy Scriptures, and of the holy sacrament of the Lord's Supper — these "passages of our Jordan" — the records and pledges of God's love to the Israel of God, have been made the scenes of the bitterest controversies, and of bloodshed of brethren, by those who bear the name of Christ. The holy sepulchre itself has been made an aceldama. — Tr.]

EIGHTH SECTION.

CHAPTER XII. 8-15.

8 9 And after him Ibzan of Beth-lehem judged Israel. And he had thirty sons [,] and thirty daughters whom [omit: whom] he sent abroad [sent out, i. e. gave in marriage], and took in [brought home] thirty daughters from abroad for his sons: and 10 he judged Israel seven years. Then died Ibzan [And Ibzan died], and was 11 buried at Bethlehem. And after him Elon, a [the] Zebulonite, judged Israel, and 12 he judged Israel ten years. And Elon the Zebulonite died, and was buried in 13 Aijalon in the country of Zebulun. And after him Abdon the son of Hillel, a [the] 14 Pirathonite, judged Israel. And he had forty sons and thirty nephews [grandsons], 15 that rode on threescore and ten ass colts: and he judged Israel eight years. And Abdon the son of Hillel the Pirathonite died, and was buried in Pirathon in the land of Ephraim, in the mount of the Amalekites [Amalekite].

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

The special value of the notices concerning these three Judges consists in the contrast which they offer to the fortunes of Jephthah. These three all have what Jephthah had not. They all have children in abundance, and are happy in them (Ps. cxxvii. 3 ff.). Ibzan has thirty daughters, whom he gives in marriage, and thirty daughters-in-law. Abdon, likewise, has forty sons, and looks on thirty flourishing grandsons. The people is familiar with the places of their nativity, and knows where their sepulchres are. Indeed, some of these places, even with their old names, are not lost to this day. For even the native place of Ibzan, although it was not the celebrated Bethlehem, but another in Zebulun (Josh. xix. 15), has in our day been identified as Beit Lahm by Robinson (iii. 113). Keil's remark that we are not to think here of the Bethlehem in Judah, must indeed be allowed, although the Jewish legend does think of it and identifies Ibzan with Boaz.<sup>1</sup> But that this Bethlehem always appears with the addition "in Judah" (so also in Judg. xvii. 7), has its ground in the very fact that the other Bethlehem was not unknown.

<sup>1</sup> The unhistorical character of the legend is the more evident, the more clear it is that chapter xii. treats only of northern heroes, whereas the narratives of southeastern heroes and struggles begin at chapter xiii., and continue down to Samuel and David.

The definition "in Judah" could here be the less omitted because the next Judge also belonged to Zebulun.

Aijalon also, the place where Elon, the second mentioned Judge, is said to have died, and where he probably also resided, seems to be recognized in Jalûn, a place of ruins (cf. Van de Velde, referred to by Keil). Pirathon, the birthplace of the third Judge, whose name Hillel is a highly celebrated one among the Jews of later times, was already recognized by Esthor ha-Parchi in the modern Fer'ata (פרעתה), and has been rediscovered by Robinson and others (cf. Zunz, in Asher's Benj. of Tudela, ii. 426; Robinson, iii. 134). They all enjoy in fact every blessing of life of which Jephthah was destitute; we hear of their children, their fathers, and their graves; but of their deeds we hear nothing. They have judged, but not delivered. They enjoyed distinction, because they were rich; but they never rose from the condition of exiled and hated men to the dignity of princes, urged thereto by the humble entreaties of their countrymen. Of them, we know nothing but their wealth; of Jephthah, nothing but his renown.

They had herds, but made no sacrifices. Their daughters were married; but the unmarried daughter of Jephthah survives them all as an example of the obedience and faith of every noble maiden heart. They had full houses, and widely known monuments; and Jephthah went from an empty house to an unknown grave: but his name, consecrated by the Apostle's benediction, shines forevermore as that of a hero of faith. Such contrasts the narrator wishes to rescue from concealment. The heathen Achilles, according to the legend of the Greeks, chose immortal fame in preference to length of life and pleasure. What would we choose, if choice were given us between Ibzan or Hillel and Jephthah? Or rather, let us Christians choose the Cross of Him who lives forever!

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

After Gideon and Abimelech, two peaceful Judges are named, concerning whose official life nothing is reported. A similar relation subsists between Jephthah and his successors. The comparison may serve for instruction. The result of Gideon's deeds was glory and greatness; of Abimelech's tyranny, terrors and punishment. Both kinds of results were brought to view, for the instruction of the nations, in the career of Jephthah. His victory was mighty against those without; his chastisement towards those within. The seed which he sowed in tears, sprang up in joy for others.

The three Judges have everything that Jephthah has not, — children, paternal home, and commemoration of their death. But they have no heroic victory like his, and his only daughter is an example for all time. Jephthah judged only a short time, and died bowed down with grief and loneliness. But neither can prosperity avail to lengthen years. These peaceful Judges judged only seven, ten, and eight years, respectively. How different is Jephthah's life from theirs! But the kingdom of God does not move onward in tragedies alone, but also in meekness and quietude.

The teachings of God are calculated to serve truth, not to promote human glory. Worldly vanity strives for the immortality of time. It is a strange exhibition of human folly, when great deeds are performed for the sake of the monuments and statues with which they are rewarded. In the kingdom of God, other laws obtain. Jephthah is the great warrior hero; but neither the place of his birth nor that of his death is known. Monuments determine nothing in the history which God writes, but only Godlike deeds. The faithful who have died in God, are followed by their works.

STARKE: It is better to bestow celebrity on one's native land, by virtuous actions, than to derive celebrity from one's native land.

NINTH SECTION.

THE OPPRESSION OF THE PHILISTINES. SAMSON, THE NAZARITE JUDGE.

Renewed apostasy.

CHAPTER XIII. 1.

- 1 And the children [sons] of Israel did evil again [continued to do evil] in the sight of the Lord [Jehovah]; and the Lord [Jehovah] delivered them into the hand of the Philistines forty years.

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

The same fatal history repeats itself everywhere. Not one single tribe, the Book of Judges teaches us, is exempted from it. Apostasy is constantly followed by subjection, whether it be inflicted by eastern or western neighbor-tribes. It is written, ch. ii. 14, that when Israel falls into sin, it will be persecuted by all the nations round about. And ch. iii. 3 includes the "five princes of the Philistines" among those through whom Israel is to become acquainted with distress and war. The Book began with the oppression of the Mesopotamian king in the east, from which Othniel, the hero of Judah, liberated the people. After tracing a circular course through the east and northeast, it ends, like the daily course of the sun, in the west; and the tribe of Judah, with which the narrative began, is again brought forward at its close. As far back as ch. x. 7, in connection with events after the death of Abimelech, we read that God "gave Israel up into the hands of the Philistines and the sons of Ammon." The heroic achievement of Jephthah against Ammon is, however, first reported. (The Judges named immediately afterwards belong to northern tribes, two to Zebulun, one to Ephraim.) Now the writer comes to speak of the great conflicts which Israel had to wage with the brave and well-equipped people of the five Philistine cities on the coast, and which, with varying fortunes, continued to the time of David. The tribes especially concerned in them were Dan, the western part of Judah, and Simeon, encircled by Judah. How changed were the times!

Once, the men of Judah, in their stormlike career of victory, had won even the great cities on the sea-coast. Afterwards, they were not only unable to maintain possession of them, but through their own apostasy from God and the genuine Israelish spirit, became themselves dependent on them. Dan had already been long unable to hold its ground anywhere except on the mountains (ch. i. 34). Now, the Philistines were powerful and free in all the Danite cities. Chapter x. 15 f. tells of the earnest repentance of the sons of Israel before God. But such a statement is not made here, although the history of a new Judge is introduced. Everywhere else the narrative, before it relates the mighty deeds of a Shophet, premises that Israel had cried unto God, and that consequently God had taken pity upon them. Now, unless it be assumed that ch. x. 15 refers also to Dan and Judah, as in ver. 6 the Philistines are likewise already spoken of, it is remarkable that the narrative of Samson's exploits is not preceded by a similar remark. It is a point worthy of special notice. For since the story of Israel's apostasy is repeated, that of its repentance would likewise have been repeated. That which he does not relate, the narrator must have believed to have had no existence. And in fact no such repentance can have taken place at this time in Dan and Judah, as we read of in Gilead. The history of the hero, whose deeds are about to be related, proves this. If, then, such a man nevertheless arose, the compassion which God thereby manifested toward Israel; was doubtless called forth by the few, scattered here and there, who sought after and acknowledged Him. The power which shows itself in the history of Samson's activity is of a similarly isolated, individual character. It is only disconnected deliverances which Israel receives through him. It is no entire national renovation, such as were brought about by former Judges within their fields of action. Herein the history of Samson differs entirely from the events of Othniel's, Ehud's, Barak's, Gideon's, and Jephthah's times, just as he himself differs from those heroes. Jephthah also speaks as an individual I, when he treats with the enemy; he was in fact the national I, for his will was the will of the people, his repentance their repentance. He can say, "I and my people," (ch. xii. 2) : his people have made him their prince. Samson is an individual without a people; a mighty I, but no prince; a single person, consecrated to God, and made the instrument of his Spirit almost without his own will; whereas Jephthah and his people are one in penitential disposition and trust in God. Hence, the circumstance that, although Samson was a Judge, and announced by an angel of God, it is nevertheless not recorded that before his advent the "sons of Israel had cried to God," affords an introductory thought important for the right apprehension of the peculiar and remarkable narratives in which the new hero appears.

CHAPTER XIII. 2-7.

- 2 And there was a certain man of Zorah, of the family of the Danites, whose
- 3 name was Manoah; and his wife was barren, and bare not. And the [an] angel
- of the Lord [Jehovah] appeared unto the woman, and said unto her, Behold, now,
- 4 thou art barren, and bearest not: but thou shalt conceive, and bear a son. Now
- therefore [And now] beware, I pray thee, and drink not wine, nor strong drink,
- 5 and eat not any unclean thing: For lo, thou shalt conceive, and bear a son; and
- no razor shall come on his head: for the child [boy] shall be a Nazirite unto
- [of] God from the womb: and he shall begin to deliver Israel out of the hand of
- 6 the Philistines. Then [And] the woman came and told her husband, saying,
- A man of God came unto me, and his countenance [appearance] was like the - countenance [appearance] of an angel of God, very terrible [august]: but [and]
- 7 I asked him not whence he was, neither told he me his name: But [And] he said
- unto me, Behold, thou shalt conceive, and bear a son; and now drink no wine nor
- strong drink, neither eat any unclean thing: for the child [boy] shall be a Nazirite
- to [of] God from the womb to the day of his death.

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Vers. 2, 3. And there was a certain man of Zorah. In the times of Israel's penitence, men rose up filled with the Spirit of God; when this was not the case, God had to bring forth the hero for himself. Samson's election was unlike that of any other Judge. Concerning Othniel and Ehud, it is simply said, "and God set them up as deliverers" (וַיִּשָּׂא). Barak was called through Deborah, who was a prophetess. An "angel of God" came also to liberate the people from Midian; but he came to Gideon, a man of valor already proved. Jephthah's case has just been considered. The election of Samson presents an altogether different phase. He is chosen before he is born. An angel of God comes, not to him, but to his mother. Jephthah is recognized by Gilead as the right man, because he has begun (וַיִּתְּחַל) to triumph over the enemy. In Samson's case, it is predicted to his mother that her son "shall begin" (לָרֵאשׁוֹת) to deliver Israel.

The father of Samson was of Zorah (see below on ver. 25), of the race of Dan; whence Samson is also called Bedan (1 Sam. xii. 11). He bears the beautiful name Manoah, "Rest," equivalent to the Greek Ἡσυχος, Hesychius, — a name sufficiently peculiar for the father of so restless a spirit as Samson. The name of his wife is not given. Jewish tradition (Baba Bathra, 91) derives her from the tribe Judah, and with reference to 1 Chron. iv. 3, names her Zeleponi or Hazeleponi. The parents were at first childless. The mother was barren, as Sarah was before her. But it is not related of her, any more than of Sarah, that she prayed for a son. This can only be inferred from the similar instance of Hannah (1 Sam. i. 10); but it does not appear, that, like Hannah, she made a vow. Nor is it said of her and Manoah that they were old, as in the cases of Sarah and Elizabeth (Luke i. 7). They were pious, uncomplaining people, who lived in retirement, and had hitherto borne their childless condition with trustful resignation. Nevertheless, it was this childless condition that peculiarly adapted the wife for the right reception of the announcement which is made to her. The joy which it inspires prepares her fully for the sacrifice which it requires. It holds out a scarcely hoped for happiness, which she will gladly purchase with the restraints imposed upon her. But this is not the only ground why she is chosen. An announcement like that made to her requires faith in the receiver. The pious disposition of the parents shows itself in this faith, by which, less troubled with doubt than Sarah and Zacharias, they receive as certain that which is announced to them.

Ver. 4. And now beware, I pray thee, and drink not wine nor intoxicating drink. For Samson, the child that is to be born to her, shall be a "Nazir of God." The ideas which here come to light, are of uncommon instructiveness. They reveal a surprisingly free and discriminating conception of the life and wants of the Israel of that time. Far-reaching thoughts, which still influence the Christian Church of our own day, are reflected in them.

I. The law of the Nazirite and his vow, in Num. vi., rests upon the great presuppositions which are implied in Israel's calling. In Ex. xix. 6, God says to Israel, "Ye shall be unto me a kingdom of priests, and an holy nation;" but he precedes it (ver. 5) by the words, "Ye shall be a possession unto me out of all nations, for all the earth is mine." All nations are God's; but among them, Israel was to be his holy people; and the law expresses in symbolic actions the moral ideas through which Israel exhibits itself as holy and consecrated. Within the holy nation, the priests occupy the same relation which the nation holds to the world. Their service, in sacrifice, prayer, and atonement, expresses especially consecration and nearness to God. Moreover, with respect to this service they have likewise a law, whose external command represents the internal idea of their consecration. The command to Aaron is, that the priests, when they go into the tabernacle, are not to drink wine nor strong drink, in order that they may be able to distinguish between holy and unholy, and to teach the children of Israel (Lev. x. 9); for wine is a mocker (Prov. xx. 1). Wine, says Isaiah, with reference to the priesthood of his day (ch. xxviii. 7), has drowned all priestly consecration. The consequences of intoxication show themselves not only in a man like Nabal (1 Sam. xxv. 36), but also in the case of a pious man, like Lot.

That death is the wages of sin, the Old Testament teaches on every page. The priests are to abstain from wine, lest they die. Hence, also, they are not to touch a corpse, for it has the nature of sin and uncleanness (Lev. xxi. 1), and the priests are to be holy. But although the special official priesthood was given by law to the tribe of Levi, holiness and consecration of life were not limited to that tribe: every one, no matter what his tribe, can consecrate himself to God, and without the aid of office, visibly realize the general priesthood in his own person. It is the peculiarity of the law, that it expresses every internal religious emotion by means of a visible act. It obliges the inward life to allow itself to be visibly recognized. All Israel was to be holy; but when an Israelite, in a condition of special spiritual exaltation, rising above the common connection between God and the people, as mediated by the priests, vowed himself to God, this act also was made the subject of ordinances, by which the Nazir, as he who thus vowed was called, was distinguished from other men, and held to special obligations. Hence, an Israelite can vow himself to God for a time, and is accordingly during that time holy to God in an especial sense (Num. vi. 8). Without holding any priestly office, he enters into a free and sacred service before God. Hence, during the whole time of his vow, he is forbidden to touch wine or strong drink, as if he were constantly officiating in the tabernacle, although the priests, when not actually engaged in service, were under no restraint. The priests, generally forbidden to touch a corpse, are yet allowed to do so in the case of a blood relative (Lev. xxi. 1 ff.); but the Nazir, who is to look upon himself as if he were ever in the sanctuary, from which every impurity is excluded, is not to know any exception. He may not touch the dead body of even father or mother. Yea, he is himself, as it were, a temple or altar of God, as appears from the personal mark by which he is distinguished. The priest comes only to the altar; and is forbidden to wear the signs of the idolaters on his hair and beard (Lev. xxi. 5), and is moreover distinguished by his clothing. The Nazir is in the congregation, his clothing is not different from that of others; but he is himself an altar; and therefore, as over an altar, so over his body, and over the head of that body, no iron may be lifted up. "When thou makest an altar of stone," says Moses, "thou shalt not build it of hewn stone; for if thou lift up thy iron upon it, thou hast desecrated it" (Ex. xx. 25). Accordingly, Joshua built an altar of stones "over which no man had lifted up any iron" (Josh. viii. 31). The reason for this prohibition is grounded, not in the nature of stone, but in the symbolical significance of iron. Iron, as the Mishnah observes (Middoth, iii. 4), must not even touch the altar; for iron is used to shorten life, but the altar to lengthen it (comp. my treatise Schamir, pp. 57, 58). It is well known that other ancient nations regarded iron in the same way. The Egyptians called it "Typhon's Bones" (Plutarch, de Osirid. cap. lxii). Iron, according to the oracle (Pausan. iii. 3, 4), is the image of evil, because it is used in battle.<sup>1</sup> When, therefore, it was enjoined upon the Nazir to let no knife come upon his head during the time of his vow, the ground of the injunction was none other than this: that since the Nazir, like the altar, is holy and consecrate to God, iron, the instrument of death and terror, must not touch him.<sup>2</sup>

is justified by Josh. viii. 31, where, with evident reference to Ex. xx. 25, בְּרִיזָה is substituted for בְּרִיזָה. — Tr.]

The Nazir is a walking altar of God; and his flowing hair is the visible token of his consecration, reminding both himself and the people of the sacred vows he has assumed. It is the proper mark of the Nazir, as the linen garment is that of the Levite. By it he is known, and from it probably comes his name. It may be assumed that the signification "to devote one's self, to abstain from," of the verb נָזַר, belongs to it only in consequence of the distinction attached to the נָזַר. It seems to me that

Nazir is equivalent to καρχηρόδων, long-haired, Cincinnatus, curly-haired, or Harfaggr (Haralld hinn Harfaggr). For it has been justly remarked that in Num. vi. the term Nazir is already accepted as a familiar expression. It may be compared with the Latin cirrus, curl, lock, or tuft of hair (cf. caesaries = caeraries); for comparative philology shows that in most verbs beginning with נ, this letter is a specific Hebrew prefix to the root, so that נָזַר, to guard, to keep, may be compared with τηρέω; נָסַר, to bear, with τλάω; נָחַר, brass, with as; נָחַשׁ, serpent, with the onomatopoeitic ziehen, to hiss; נָחַם with gem-re; נָלַח with salire, etc. The word נָזַר would then get its signification diadem, ornament (cf. נָזַר in the same sense), just as the Greek κομμός, derived from κόμη, κομῆς, comes to signify adornment. To trace the original etymological identity of cirrus, cicinnus, and the Sanskrit kikura, with the Hebrew nazir, or to inquire whether the terms ξυρομαι, to shave one's self, and κείρω, to cut the hair, are connected with the same root, would be out of place here. Precisely those terms which designate objects of primitive interest to man, are most deeply imbedded in the general philological treasures of all nations. But not to pursue these speculations any farther, it must already appear probable, that the use of nazir in Lev. xxv. 5, where it is applied to the untrimmed vine of the sabbatic year, is to be explained by reference not to the Nazaritic custom of human beings, vowing and consecrating themselves to God, but to the original meaning of the root. The Sabbath-year being time belonging to God (Lev. xxv. 4), no knife was applied during its course to the vine, which from that circumstance was named nazir. This would have been an unsuitable designation, if it had been derived from the vows assumed by the human Nazir; for such subjective activity could not be ascribed to the vine. It was the objective appearance of the Nazir, who, whether man or vine, was holy, and therefore had not been touched by the knife, which gave rise to the name. The name suggests the unshaven condition, the long hair, of the Nazarite, not primarily his consecration, although the sacred character of the person, through the law, gave sanctity to the name and set it apart from common uses, just as the rite of circumcision was indebted for its name (מִצְוָה), not to the sacramental character of the rite, but to the mere act of cutting (כָּרַח, σμίλη), and then reflected its own sanctity upon the name. Long hair, although without any reference to the Nazaritic institute it may be called נָזַר (cf. Jer. vii. 29), was the proper mark of the Nazir, because regularly set apart for this purpose by the law. To sanctify the natural life, is the very thing at which the law constantly aims. By its institutions its spiritual requisitions are rendered visible and personal. The circumcision of the foreskin is after all but the national image of circumcision of the heart, and the Nazaritic institute is the symbol of the general priesthood, in which no sin or impurity is to sully the free service of God. But the visible character in which each of these conceptions appeared, was more than a subjective, mutable image: it was a definite and unchangeable law. It was, to a certain extent, a sacrament. It is instructive to see how the relation of spirit and law affects Biblical language and conceptions. The wearing of long hair, a purely natural act, is first, by spiritual ideas, raised into an expression of the general priesthood, in which man is a living altar; but when long hair has become characteristic of the sacred Nazir, whose duty it is to keep far from impurity, a new verb is derived from his name, with the sole spiritual signification of "withholding one's self from what is unclean." The same process may be noted in connection with circumcision. Originally elevated into a sacrament by the intervention of spiritual ideas, incorporated into the law, it affords occasion for the transfer of its name to the spiritual conceptions of the circumcision of tongue and heart. But especially remarkable is the apprehension of the relation between spirit and law in the history of Samson.

II. Why was it necessary for the hero who should begin to deliver Israel, to be a Nazir? Why was the same election and education not necessary in the cases of the other great judges, as, for instance, Gideon and Jephthah? Were then those heroes not spiritual Nazarites, who gave their lives to the service of God? May we not understand the opening words of Deborah's Song as indicating their spiritual consecration to Jehovah: "That in Israel waved the hair, in the people's self-devotion" (see on ch. v. 2)? No doubt; and for that very reason Samson is distinguished from them. For those men arose in times when the tribes of Israel themselves repented and turned their hearts to God. In Samson's day, the situation was different. Dan and Judah were oppressed, but not repentant. An uprising from within through faith, is not to be expected. It is brought about, therefore, as it were from without, by means of the law. The power of the objective, spiritual law manifests itself. It becomes an organ of deliverance, when the subjective source of freedom no longer flows. The angel would have found no Gideon. A prophetess like Deborah, there was not. But the law abides: it is independent of the current popular spirit. It is thus the last sure medium through which the help of God can come to Israel. This significance of the law, and its objective power, is very instructively set forth before the people in the person of Samson. It is this also which, from Samson onward, becomes the ruling force in the vocation and appointment of deliverers, until the kingship is established, which by the objective rite of priestly anointing, changes David the shepherd-boy into David the victorious ruler. And this instruction concerning the law as a whole, is imparted through the medium of the special law concerning the Nazir, because it is here that the relation to be pointed out comes most clearly to view. For precisely the Nazariteship is, according to the Biblical law, the outflow of unrequired, voluntary consecration to God on the part of an individual. No doubt, to a certain extent, the earlier heroes, though not Nazarites in form, were such self-devoted men. But heroes such as they do not arise in times when the absence of penitence and faith dulls the prophets and Nazarites (cf. Amos, ii. 12). Hence, the history of Samson teaches that Israel would have had nothing to hope for from the Nazariteship, if it had had no other than subjective validity. When faith is wanting among the people, no man becomes a Nazir; but the objective law can make of the Nazir, a man. In Samson's case, the Nazariteship makes the hero, the long hair characterizes his strength, the renunciations of the mother consecrate the child. Samson, a Nazarite from his birth and without his own will, becomes what he is only as such, and continues to be a hero only so long as he continues to be a Nazarite. The Nazariteship is first, everything else second, in him. Its power over him is so objective, that it already operates on him before he is born, before anything like free consciousness can be thought of. The command addresses not him whom it concerns, but his mother, and she, during her pregnancy, becomes a female Nazir, in order that her son may be able to become a hero. It is this that properly distinguishes Samson from the other heroes; and its occasion appears in the fact that the narrator could not, as at other times, introduce his story by stating that the tribes had persistently "cried unto God."

1 The following is said to have been uttered by Apollonius of Tyana: "Let the iron spare the hair of a wise man. For it is not right that it should touch a place where lie the sources of all the senses, whence all sacred sounds and voices issue, and prayers proceed, and the word of wisdom interprets." — Philostrat., Vit. Apollon., viii. 6.

2 Hence, we cannot agree with the explanations cited and proposed in Oehler's article on the Naziraat, in Herzog's Encyclopädie (x. 208). A poem by Max Letteris, on the "Locks of the Nazarite," in Jo'owicz's Blüthenkranz, p. 239, has entirely missed the idea of the Nazaritic institution.

III. The Mishnah (Nazir, i. 2) already distinguishes between a perpetual Nazarite and a Samson-Nazarite. And in fact, the Nazariteship of Samson is unique, has never repeated itself, and never can repeat itself; for it is conditioned by the history of his age. Samuel also is consecrated by his mother's vow that he shall belong to God, and that no razor shall come upon his head; but there is nothing to show that the mother observed the Nazaritic rules in her own person, nor is anything said about any virtue in long hair in connection with Samuel. Hannah was wholly self-moved in the making of her vow. The case of John the Baptist likewise stands entirely by itself. Here, the birth of the child is indeed announced by an angel, but his character as a Nazarite is expressed in language altogether peculiar: "He shall be great in the sight of the Lord, and shall drink neither wine nor strong drink." John will be great before God, and because of that greatness will drink no wine. Nothing is said about long hair, and the origin of John's vow is placed, not in the act of another, but in the strength with which God had endowed himself. The Mishnah puts it as a possible case that a person should vow to be a Nazarite like Samson; that is, the vow is hypothetically so limited that, while it requires him who makes it to wear his hair long, he is not required to bring sacrifices for defilement. Such a vow was named after Samson, because a part of his life was imitated by it. But properly speaking, a vow to be like Samson, is impossible. For Samson's vow began not with himself, but with his mother. According to the law in the 6th chapter of Numbers, an Israelite could take a vow upon himself for a longer or, like the four friends of James (Acts xxi. 23), for a shorter period. When the time was expired, he shaved himself, and brought an offering. But no one could vow to be like Samson. It was indeed within the power of a mother to promise to bring up her child like Samson, but even then she had no right to expect the same results as in the case of Samson. It is precisely the impotence of human subjectivity that is demonstrated by Samson's history. It cannot be the wish of all mothers to have Samson-children, when they suffer the hair of their offspring to grow. The angel's announcement, through which the spirit in the law begins to operate even in the maternal womb, is the original source of strength. The Spirit of God operates on mother and son, through the Nazariteship as its organ. The power of the Nazir, the holy influence of the law, opens the man himself; the outflow of divine consecration into the life of the consecrated cannot take place without the Spirit of God. The theological doctrine of the preparatory history of Samson, is just this: that while the law in its immutable objectivity is placed over against the subjective forces of prophecy and heroic inspiration, yet it can never of itself, but only by virtue of the Spirit of God pervading and quickening it, become the organ of deliverance.

The Nazaritic institute is the image of the general priesthood, of the fact that outside of the tribe of Levi, it is possible for man to belong wholly to God. The visible acts which it prescribes, represent, as in a figure, the purity and sinlessness of the heart consecrated to God. In the case of Samson, this Nazariteship begins from his mother's womb. Were it in the power of a son born of human parents, to be sinless through the law, Samson the Nazarite ought to have been sinless. But only Christ is the true Nazarite in spirit, whose life realizes the purity of the idea, and whose free love, rooted in God, continues among men from the womb until death. Jacob, the dying patriarch, announced a blessing "on the head of Joseph and on the crown of the head of the Nazir of his brethren" (Gen. xlix. 26); and there is no reason to doubt that the primitive Christian consciousness interpreted the expression "Nazir of his brethren" not of Joseph, but found in the "and" a link connecting the blessing of Joseph with the person of Him who was a Nazir of the brethren of Joseph. It saw in the passage a prophecy of the Messiah, who though not descended from Levi, was yet the true holy and consecrated high-priest. Hence, the opinion that in the language of the evangelist Matthew (ii. 23), "that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophets, He shall be called a Nazarene," reference is made to the נָזִיר, the "Nazir of his brethren," is not to be hastily set aside. Remarkable, at all events, is it that the ancient Jewish interpretation, when Jacob after the blessing on Dan (Gen. xlix. 17) adds the words: "I wait for thy salvation, Jehovah!" conceives him to glance from the nearer but transient deliverance by Samson, to the more distant but eternal redemption of Messiah (Beresch. Rabba, p. 86 c; cf. the Targums on the passage); and that, as already mentioned, the mother of Samson, in 1 Chron. iv. 3, is named Hazeleponi or Zeleponi, i. e., "the shadow falls on me," which may be compared with the words of the angel to the mother of Jesus: "the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee."

Ver. 5. And let no razor come upon his head. Here, and in the history of Samuel, the razor is called מַלְכָּה, whereas in Num. vi. 4 מַלְכָּה is used.

Both terms come from the same stem מָלַךְ, nu-dare, to uncover, as it were novare, to renew, whence also novacula, sharp knife, razor. There appears to be less ground for comparison with the Greek μαχίον, Latin marra, the signification "spade" being too far removed. On the other hand, a certain relationship of מַלְכָּה with the Greek ἐκσῆρα, Samekrit kshchura, shears, may not be altogether denied.

He shall begin. For the Philistines oppressed Israel forty years, and Samson judged his people only twenty. Samson began to restore victory to Israel, he did not make it full and final. The angel of God who calls the hero out of the womb of his mother, knows that he will not finish that for which God nevertheless gave him strength. He knows it, and therefore does not speak as he did to Gideon: "Thou shalt deliver Israel" (ch. vi. 14).

Vers. 6, 7. And the woman came and told her husband. Before telling him what the angel had said, she excuses herself for having obtained no particular information about the bearer of the announcement. She should have asked him whence he was, but dared not; for he was a "man of God," with the look of an "angel of God." The angel appeared in human form; but there was an imposing splendor about him, which terrified the woman. Such, probably, had also been the case in Gideon's experience. In her narrative she supplies what we do not find in ver. 5, that the child's character, as a Nazir of God, is to last from the womb until "the day of his death."

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

The grace of God shows itself constantly more wondrously. It was to be made ever clearer in Israel that all salvation comes from God, and that without God there is no peace. With God all things are possible. He can raise up children for himself out of stones. His works are independent of human presuppositions and conditions. He has no need of antecedent historical conditions in order to raise up men. When in times of impenitence even vessels are wanting, He creates the vessels He needs.

How differently God proceeds in the election of grace from the methods human thought would conceive, is shown by the history of all previous Judges. The deliverer arises there where the natural understanding would never have looked for him. But Samson God raises up in a manner in which no man ever conjectured the growth of a hero to take place. The other Judges He selected as men: Samson He brought up to be a hero.

The earlier Judges were to a certain extent prepared for their work even before their election. Ehud had the abilities of a Benjaminite, Deborah was a prophetess, Gideon a strong man, Jephthah a successful military leader. When the Spirit of God came upon them, they became Deliverers and Judges. In Samson, God made it known that his grace is able to save Israel even when such persons are not to be found. Before birth, He consecrates the child, through his Spirit, to be a Nazarite. Hence grows a hero.

Earlier Judges were able, like Ehud, to perform single-handed exploits; but they achieved deliverance only in connection with the people. They were all military leaders of Israel, and had to stand at the head of pious hosts. In Samson it is seen that this also is not indispensable. Only individuals among the people were penitent; the tribes, as such, were unbelieving. Therefore the Spirit raised up a single man to be Judge: he alone, without army and without people, fought and delivered.

For this reason, the ancient, deeply thinking church regarded Samson especially as a type of the history of Christ. His birth was similar to that of Jesus. Like the eternal Word who became flesh, he was typically born and consecrated of the Spirit. In Christ, also, it is his sinlessness that presupposes his office as Saviour. The birth of Christ determines his resurrection. He must be born from heaven in order to return to heaven. No one can ascend into heaven but He who came down from heaven.

There was also no penitence in Israel when Christ was born. A few sought the promised Messiah in the prophets. Christ did not come to put himself at the head of a host of believers; but alone, as He was, so He stood among the people. He performs his entire work alone. He needs no legions of angels. His work is unique; and He, the worker, is a solitary hero.

Every believing heart treads in the footsteps of Christ. Fellowship is good in Christian work, but not essential. A Christian can live alone, if he be with Christ.

STARKE: God cares for his people when they are in misery, and often thinks of their redemption before they think of it themselves. — THE SAME: God connects his grace and gifts with mean things, in order to make men know that everything is to be ascribed to the grace of God, and not to the merits of men.

[BP. HALL: If Manoah's wife had not been barren, the angel had not been sent to her. Afflictions have this advantage, that they occasion God to show that mercy to us, whereof the prosperous are incapable. It would not beseem a mother to be so indulgent to a healthful child as to a sick. — THE SAME: Nature pleads for liberty, religion for restraint. Not that there is more uncleanness in the grape than in the fountain, but that wine finds more uncleanness in us than water, and that the high feed is not so fit for devotion as abstinence. — WORDSWORTH: Samson is a type of Christ; and in all those things where Samson fails, there Christ excels. Samson began to deliver Israel, but did not effect their deliverance (see ch. xiii. 1; xv. 20). He declined from his good beginnings; and fell away first into sin, and then into the hands of the enemy. But Christ not only began to deliver Israel, but was able to say on the cross, "It is finished." — TR.]

CHAPTER XIII. 8-23.

- 8 Then [And] Manoah entreated the Lord [Jehovah], and said, O my Lord [Pray, Lord — cf. ch. vi. 15], let the man of God which thou didst send come again
9 unto us, and teach us what we shall do unto the child that shall be born.<sup>1</sup> And God hearkened to the voice of Manoah; and the angel of God came again unto the woman as she sat in the field: but Manoah her husband was not with her.
10 And the woman made haste, and ran, and shewed [informed] her husband, and said unto him, Behold, the man hath appeared unto me, that came unto me the other
11 day. And Manoah arose, and went after his wife, and came to the man, and said unto him, Art thou the man that spakest unto the woman? And he said, I am.
12 And Manoah said, Now let [When now] thy words come to pass. [,] How [how] shall we order the child, and how shall we do unto him?<sup>2</sup> And the angel of the Lord [Jehovah] said unto Manoah, Of all that I said unto the woman, let her be-
14 ware. She may not eat of any thing that cometh of the vine, neither let her drink wine or strong drink, nor eat any unclean thing: all that I commanded her let her observe. And Manoah said unto the angel of the Lord [Jehovah], I pray thee, let us detain thee, until we shall have made [and make] ready a kid for [us. before]
16 thee. And the angel of the Lord [Jehovah] said unto Manoah, Though thou detain me, I will not eat of thy bread: and if thou wilt offer [prepare] a burnt-offering, thou must [omit: thou must] offer it unto the Lord [Jehovah]. For 17 Manoah knew not that he was an angel of the Lord [Jehovah]. And Manoah said unto the angel of the Lord [Jehovah], What is thy name,<sup>3</sup> that when thy sayings
18 come [word comes] to pass, we may do thee honour? And the angel of the Lord [Jehovah] said unto him, Why askest thou thus [omit: thus] after my name, 19 seeing [and] it is secret [Peli, Wonderful]? So [And] Manoah took a [the] kid, with a [and the] meat-offering, and offered it upon a [the] rock unto the Lord [Jehovah]; and the angel did wondrously [and he caused a wonder to take 20 place], and Manoah and his wife looked on. For it came to pass, when the flame went up toward heaven from off the altar, that the angel of the Lord [Jehovah] ascended in the flame of the altar, and Manoah and his wife looked on it [omit: it], 21 and fell on their faces to the ground. But [And] the angel of the Lord [Jehovah] did no more appear to Manoah and to his wife. Then Manoah knew that he was 22 an angel of the Lord [Jehovah]. And Manoah said unto his wife, We shall surely die, because we have seen God [Elohim]. But his wife said unto him, If the Lord [Jehovah] were pleased to kill us, he would not have received a burnt-offering and a meat-offering at our hands, neither would he have shewed us all these things, nor would as at this time have told us such things as these.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 8. — וַיִּבְרַח. This form may be the imperfect of pual, with the article used as a relative; but it is probably more correct, with Keil (after Ewald, 169 d), to regard it as the pual participle, the preformative ו being fallen away. Even then, however, the more regular mode of writing would be וַיִּבְרַח. — Tr.]

[2 Ver. 12. — Dr. Casel renders the clause more literally: "What will be the manner of the boy, and his doing?" But the rendering of the E. V. correctly interprets the language of the original, and agrees with our author's exposition. Whatever obscurity there may appear to be in ver. 12, is removed by ver. 8; for it is clear that the petition preferred in ver. 12 can be no other than that made in ver. 8. מִשְׁפָּט הַיָּעַר is the statute or precept (cf. the monastic term "rule") to be observed with regard to the boy — the right treatment of him by his parents; and, similarly, מַעֲשָׂאָהּ is that which they are to do to him. The genitives are genitives of the object, cf. Ges Gram. 114, 2; 121, 5. — Tr.]

[3 Ver. 17. — מִי שְׁמִי; properly quis nomen tuum, equivalent to quis nominaris. מִי asks after the person, שְׁמִי after the nature, the quality, see Ewald, 325 a." (Keil). — Tr.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Vers. 8 ff. And Manoah entreated Jehovah. The narrative affords a pleasing view of the child-like piety of an Israelitish husband and wife under the old covenant.

The adventure with the angel takes upon the whole the same course as the similar incident in the life of Gideon (cf. on ch. vi). The angel here comes and goes as there, yields to entreaties to tarry, receives an offering, disappears in the flame. But the present passage discloses also new and beautiful features, growing out of the mutual relations of Manoah and his wife. The peculiar characteristics of both husband and wife are most delicately drawn. Manoah is a pious man, he knows how to seek God in prayer, and is not unbelieving; but the statements of his wife do not appear to him to be sure enough, he would gladly have them confirmed. And for the instruction and strengthening of Israel, that faith may be full and strong, not being compelled to content itself with the testimony of one woman only to the wonderful event,—God, having respect to the unawakened condition of the people, allows himself to be entreated.<sup>1</sup> But although Manoah sees in the second appearance of the angel the fulfillment of his prayer, he still recognizes in him nothing but a man (אִישׁ). And truly, nothing is more difficult for man, even though he prays, than to receive the fulfillment of prayer! The believing obedience of Manoah to the commands touching his wife's conduct with reference to the promised child, although he conceives them to be delivered by no other than a man, indicates that the coming and preaching of such a man, here spoken of as a "man of God," was nothing unusual. There had probably been a lack only of such obedience as Manoah here shows him. What is more surprising, is, that even when the angel declines to eat of his bread, Manoah yet does not perceive that his visitor is not a man. He had intended, according to the manner of ancient hospitality, as known also to Homer, first to entertain his guest, and then to inquire after his home and name. Such inquiries have interest, and afford guarantees, only in the case of a man. But even the answer concerning the "wonderful" name, does not yet excite his attention. It is only after the angel's disappearance in the flame that he perceives,—what, however, none but a believing heart could perceive,—that he who had just departed was not a man. The wife shows herself more receptive and sensitive to the presence of a divine being. To her, the stranger's appearance, even at his first visit, seemed like that of an angel. At his second visit also, she speaks of his coming in language usually applied to angels,—“Behold, he hath appeared unto me (נִרְאָה, ver. 10). She had needed no proof or explanation. She asks no questions, but knows what he has said to her heart; and hence, she also is in no dread when now it becomes manifest that it was indeed an angel of God. Her husband is apprehensive of death; she is of good courage, and infers the contrary. She had long since foreboded the truth, and belongs to the number of those women of sacred history whose sensitive hearts enabled them to feel and see divine secrets, and whose appearance is the more attractive, the more unbelieving and unresponsive the times are, in which, as here, angels reveal themselves to women rather than to men. For although it is Manoah who prays that the man of God may come again, he appears not to him, but again to the wife. He waits, however, while she, intuitively certain that though feelings of reverence do not allow her to entreat him to tarry, he will nevertheless do so, hastens to call her husband.

Vers. 12, 13. And Manoah said, When now thy words come to pass, what will be the manner of the boy and his doing? It is peculiar that notwithstanding the plain words told him by his wife, Manoah cannot rest satisfied with them. Doubtless, it could not but appear singular to him, that his wife tells him of what she is to do, although the call to be a Nazir pertains to the son whose birth is promised. Of such directions, the Mosaic statute contained no traces. It appeared to him as if the report of his wife must contain a misunderstanding on this point. He therefore asks twice, what is to be done with the child, since hitherto he had principally heard only what the mother is to do. Hence, the angel answers him plainly: “What I commanded the mother, that do!”

Nor eat any unclean thing. It had already been said in ver. 4, “Thou shalt drink neither wine nor intoxicating drink, nor eat any thing unclean.” The older expositors identified this prohibition as to food and drink with that imposed on Nazarites in Num. vi. 4. But this is not altogether accurate, as appears from ver. 14 of our passage. Express mention is here made of all that Num. vi. 4 forbade to be eaten, namely, everything that comes from the vine, and yet it is added, “nor eat any unclean thing.” Num. vi. does not speak at all of anything “unclean,” as forbidden to the Nazirite, because no Israelite was allowed to eat what was unclean. Here the angel adds this injunction, first, because it was a time in which much of the law and customs of Israel had perhaps fallen into neglect; and, secondly, in order to serve to Manoah and his wife as an explanation of all that was enjoined upon the latter. The wife was to abstain from the use of everything that can render unclean, because a holy and pure consecration was to rest on him whom she was to bring forth.

Vers. 17 ff. Why askest thou after my name, and it is Peli? Renewed attention must constantly be directed to the nice discrimination with which the designations Jehovah, Elohim, and the Elohim, are used in the narrative. Whenever the narrator speaks, he always writes Jehovah. Concerning Samson, the expression (ver. 5) is, that he will be a Nazir of Elohim; because there Elohim indicates the general divine affluence by which he is to be surrounded, and is the term also used in Num. vi. 7: “For the consecration of his God (אֱלֹהֵי) is upon his head.” When the believing parents first speak, they speak, as in Judg. vi. 20 (see above), of the man or angel of “the God,” i. e., the God of Israel (vers. 6, 8). Especially, however, do they characterize themselves in vers. 22 and 23. Manoah anticipates death, “for we have seen Elohim,” a divine being in general. The wife, impressed by the appearance and announcement, says: “If Jehovah were pleased to kill us, he would not have accepted our offerings.” Whenever full faith returns in Israel, the full name of Israel's God, Jehovah, returns with it.

reads פֶּלִי, Peli; later authorities (cf. Keil in loc.), פֶּלִי, Pilei. In either case, the word is adjective, but identical in meaning with פֶּלִי. In Isa. ix. 5 (6), it is said: "Unto us a child is born, and his name is פֶּלִי." His name is Wonder, Wonder-worker. Isa. xxix. 14, which passage serves literally to explain our present passage, says: "לִכֹּן הִנְנִי, I will continue to show myself doing wonders to this people, doing wonder upon wonder." The epithet of wonder points to the power of him to whom it is applied. He who is a wonder, does wonders. In Isa. ix. 5 (6) the child is named Pele, not as a passive wonder, but as active; all its epithets are active: Pele, Counsellor, Mighty God, Father, Prince. Hence, here the angel also calls himself Peli, Wonder-worker. For what he does appears extraordinary. A child was chosen in the matrix, and endued with the power of doing wonders. God testifies in times of distress that He saves Israel by wonders, and does not cease, even in their ruin, to interest himself wonderfully in their behalf. Ordinary means of salvation are wanting. God ever again manifests himself in Israel as the פֶּלִי, "the wonder-worker," as He is styled Ex. xv. 11. As such He gives his name in ver. 18, and shows his power in ver. 19, when He reveals himself in the wonderful manner of his vanishing away: for the expression פֶּלִי ( "he caused a wonder"), in the latter verse, refers back to פֶּלִי, Peli, of ver. 18. The name Manoaah had not understood; but in the deed he recognized the God of wonders.

הִנְנִי יוֹסֵף לְחַפְּלִי אֶת־הָעֲסִיָּה חֶפְלִי

The key to the whole narrative is contained in this word. It sets forth that Israel's preservation and deliverance rest not in itself, but in the grace of Him who is wonderful and does wonders beyond all understanding, not merely in nature, but also in human life and history. Those explanations are therefore wholly insufficient, which render the word by "secret" or "ineffable." From the old Jewish point of view, this interpretation is intelligible; for to them the external ineffableness of the name Jehovah appeared to be its chief characteristic. Jacob, when he wrestled with the angel, asked after his name. "Why askest thou?" replied the angel, and gave it not. As he wrestled in the night, so he gave no name. Here the unseen corresponds with the unnamed. But in the instance of Samson's parents, the angel is seen. What he says and does is manifest and visible. It is stated with emphasis, that both "saw" (רָאָה). If the angel, by saying, "Why askest thou after my name?" had designed to refuse an answer to Manoaah's question, he would have contented himself with these words. But he gives him a name, and that name teaches that Manoaah is to attend rather to the message than the manner of him who brings it. If from the word "Peli" Manoaah was to learn that the name for which he asked was "ineffable," he would on hearing it have already perceived that the messenger was no man, for there was only One to whose name this could apply. But it was not till afterwards that Manoaah made this discovery. The angel, however, does not design, in this manner to reveal himself. As in the case of Gideon, so here, the deed is to show who the announcer was. Therefore, with fresh kindness, he gives him the name he bears. Angels on earth are always named from their mission and work. The Word of the New Covenant, likewise, when He became flesh, was called Christ Jesus, from his work. The angel in saying "Peli," gave one of the names of God, — that name to which his work here testified (פֶּלִי, לְעִשׂוֹת). Manoaah received it as the name of a man, as later a man occurs named Pelaiah (פֶּלִי, Neh. viii. 7).

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

STARKE: The names of God are of great circumference and vast importance, and enclose many secrets. Nomina Dei non sunt nominalia, sed realia. — LISCO: "My name is wonderful," mysterious, whose depths of meaning can only be guessed at by human thought, never fully comprehended.

[BUSH: The petition of Manoaah reminds us also that the care of children is a great concern, and that those who have the parental relation in prospect can make no more suitable prayer at the throne of grace than that of the pious Danite on this occasion. Who upon the eve of becoming parents have not need to say, as said Manoaah, "Teach us what we shall do to the child that shall be born." — BR. HALL: He that before sent his angel unasked, will much more send him again upon entreaty. — THE SAME: We can never feast the angels better, than with our hearty sacrifices to God. — BUSH (on ver. 23): This was a just mode of arguing; for such mercies were both evidences and pledges of God's love; and therefore were rather to be considered as earnest of future blessings, than as harbingers of ill. The woman in this showed herself not only the strongest believer, but the wisest reasoner. The incidents related may teach us, (1) That in times of dark and discouraging providences or sore temptations we should remember the past experience of God's goodness as a ground of present support. "Account the long suffering of God to be salvation." He that hath so kindly helped us and dealt with us hitherto, means not to destroy us at last. (2) That the sinner oppressed with a sense of his deserts has no reason to despair. Let him remember what Christ has done for him by his bloody sacrifice, and read in it a sure proof, that he does not design his death. — TR.]

CHAPTER XIII. 24, 25.

24 And the woman bare a son, and called his name Samson [Shimshon]. And the 25 child [boy] grew, and the Lord [Jehovah] blessed him. And the Spirit of the Lord [Jehovah] began to move him at times [omit: at times] in the camp of Dan, between Zorah and Eshtaol.

ETIOLOGICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Ver. 24. And called his name Shimshon. The Septuagint has Σαμψών, Samson; Josephus also, (Antiq. v. 8, 4). This pronunciation refers to the ancient derivation of the name from שִׁמְשׁוֹן, the sun, just as שִׁמְשַׁי (Shimshai, Ezra iv. 8) is pronounced Samsai (Σαμαί; according to the Vat. Cod. Σαμψά), and as we hear in later times of Sampsæans, a sun-sect.<sup>1</sup> The Masora seems to have pointed Shimshon after the analogy of Simeon (Simeon), and to have had the word שִׁמְשׁוֹן, to hear, in view. The derivation from shemesh, the sun, is, however, of long standing among the Jewish expositors also, and offers the best grounds for acceptance. Other explanations, "mighty," "bold," "desolator," proposed by various expositors, from Serarius to Keil, appear to be without any historical motive. The name may be brought into connection with the announcement to the parents, that their son would "begin to deliver Israel." To Hebrew conceptions, the rising of the sun is an act of victory. In this spirit Deborah sings: "So fall all thy foes, O God; but אֲהַרְיִי נִצָּאת הַשֶּׁמֶשׁ פְּנֵיבָרְתִּי, those who love thee are as the rising of the sun in his strength" (geburah), as Samson was a gibbor. The Jewish expositors (cf. Jalkut, Judic. n. 69) said, that "Samson was named after the name of God, who is called Sun and Shield of Israel" (Ps. lxxxiv. 12). The symbol of servitude is night, and accordingly the tyranny of Egypt is so called; but the beginning of freedom is as the dawn of day or the rising of the sun. The interpretation of our hero's name as laxupōs, mighty, by Josephus, is only a translation of gibbor, for the sun also is called a hero (Ps. xix. 5, 6). It is an allegorical, not etymological interpretation, and gives no warrant for charging Josephus with philological error, as Gesenius does (Gesch. der hebr. Spr. p. 82). That some writers find a sun-god in this interpretation, is no reason for giving it up;<sup>2</sup> especially when this is done, in a manner as bold as it confused, as by Nork (Bibl. Myth., ii. 405), who goes so far as to compare a father of Adonis, "Manes" (!!!), with Manoaah, and drags in the "Almanack" besides. The Mosaic law forbade to make idol images of wood and stone as representations of nature; but the use of spiritual, figurative images drawn from sun and moon, is constantly characteristic of Scripture. Notwithstanding all nature-worship as connected with the sun, and its censure in Scripture, God Himself is called the "Sun of Righteousness." The false syncretisms to which more recent times are inclined, have their origin in the failure to separate rightly the fundamental ideas of Biblical and of heathen life.

The celebrated Armenian family of the Amaduni considered itself to be of Jewish extraction. It descends, says Moses Chorenensis (lib. ii. cap. lvii. ed. de Florival. i. 283), from Samson, the son of Manoaah. "Il est vrai, qu'on voit encore aujourd'hui la même chose dans la race des Amaduni, car ce sont des hommes robustes," etc. A parallel to this is afforded by the Vilkinsa-legend, which places at the head of its narratives the powerful knight Samson, dark of complexion, like an Oriental, with "hair and beard black as pitch" (cf. the edition by von der Hagen, i. 4), and from whom the mighty race of the Amelungen springs (cf. W. Grimm, Die Deutsche Heldensage, p. 264).

Ver. 25. And the Spirit of Jehovah began to move him. The fulfillment had taken place. The son had been born. He grew up under the blessing of God. His flourishing strength, his greatness of spirit, are the consequences of this blessing. But the consecration which was on his head, and which through the abstinence of his mother he had already received in the earliest moments of corporal formation and growth, was a power which imparted to him not only physical strength, but also spiritual impulses. No angel ever comes to Samson; God never talks with him; no appearances, like those to his parents, occur to him. Whatever he carries in his soul and in his members, he has received from the consecration that is upon his head. It is from this source that he derives that elevation of spirit which raises him above the level of common life, and urges him on to deeds of heroism.

In the camp of Dan, between Zorah and Eshtaol. Zorah was Samson's native place, always appears in juxtaposition with Eshtaol (Josh. xv. 33; xix. 41), and was inhabited by Danites and men of Judah. Its site is recognized in the Tell of Sur'a, from whose summit Robinson had a fine and extensive view (Bibl. Res. iii. 153). For Eshtaol no probable conjecture has yet been offered. The "Camp of Dan" (cf. ch. xviii. 12) was a place between the two cities, both of which are located by the Onomasticon in the region north of Eleutheropolis. Eusebius in mentioning Eshtaol says, "Ἐσθηρ ὁμαῖρο Σαμψών," thence Samson set out, which Jerome corrected into, "ubi mortuus est Samson," where Samson died. The "Camp of Dan," if it were not a regular military post, must at all events have had warlike recollections con-

Hellodore of Tricca, calls himself a "descendant of Helios," from the fact that he belonged to Emesa, the city of a celebrated temple of the sun (lib. x. at the close).

1 On other similar forms, cf. Selden, De Diis Syris Synt. §. 226.

2 As little reason as there is to doubt the etymology of Hellodorus, because the author of the Æthiopica, Bishop nected with its name and hill-top situation (cf. ch. i. 34). It was there that the passion for exploits against the Philistines first seized on Samson. The expression, וַתְּחַל הָרוּחַ, "the spirit began," manifestly answers to the וַיֵּחַל הָרוּחַ, "he shall begin," of ver. 5. The young man was first seized upon by the Spirit of God, לְפָעַם. The operation which this word לְפָעַם expresses is not an organic work of faith, such as Gideon or Jephthah perform. It is an impulsive inspiration; the sudden ebullition of a spiritual force, which, as in the case of the Seer it manifests itself in words, in that of Samson breaks forth into action. But yet it is no demoniac paroxysm, nor the drunken madness of a Bacchant or the frenzy of a rude Berserker, but the sober movement of the Spirit of God, which, while giving heroic power, also governed it. How little mythical the history is, is evinced by the fact that, according to the narrator, the place is still known where the young man first became conscious that he had another calling than to assist his father at home in the field. The Spirit of God thrusts him out into public activity. His father's house becomes too narrow for him. His public career begins. What that career is to be, is yet to be revealed to him. But he is driven out, and he goes. From the Camp of Dan he issues forth, a youthful hero, like Parcival, in quest of adventure. With what result, is related farther on.

CHAPTER XIV. 1-4.

- 1 And Samson went down to Timnath [Timnathah], and saw a woman in Tim-
- 2 nath [Timnathah] of the daughters of the Philistines. And he came up, and told his father and his mother, and said, I have seen a woman in Timnath [Timnathah]
- 3 of the daughters of the Philistines: now therefore get her for me to wife. Then [And] his father and his mother said unto him, Is there never a woman among the daughters of thy brethren, or among all my people, that thou goest to take a wife of the uncircumcised Philistines? And Samson said unto his father, Get her for
- 4 me; for she pleaseth me well [is pleasing in my eyes]. But [And] his father and his mother knew not that it was of the Lord [Jehovah], that [for] he sought an occasion against [from] the Philistines: for at that time the Philistines had dominion [were lordling it] over Israel.

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Ver. 1. And Samson went down to Timnath. Timnath or Timnathah, the present Tibneh, situated to the southwest of Zorah, at the confluence of Wady Sumt with Wady Surâr (Ritter, xvi. 116; [Gage's Transl. iii. 241]), on the border of the tribe of Judah (Josh. xv. 10), was assigned by Joshua to the tribe of Dan (Josh. xix. 43), but had fallen into the hands of the Philistines.

Ver. 2, 3. Get her for me to wife. The history of Samson abounds with instructive notices of the social life of the times. The women lead a free life, not shut up, as they are in the East of the present day. The stranger can see the beauty of the daughters of the land. But Samson cannot yet dispense with the permission of his parents. He is yet in their house, unmarried, a קָדוֹשׁ. From the choice of Samson, and his mode of life, there comes to view, in the first place, the prevalent, though unlawful, admixture of Israelitish and heathen families and customs. But the barriers raised by difference of nationality are nevertheless manifest. The parents at first refuse their consent to Samson's choice; but they cannot resist his prayer. He is their only son, — and such a son! full of strength and youthful promise, — therefore it gives them pain.

Ver. 4. And his father and his mother knew not. If the mother kept in her heart the saying that her son would begin to deliver Israel, his strength and gifts doubtless awakened many hopes within her. But his wish to marry a Philistine maiden, seemed to destroy every expectation. He who when in his mother's womb was already consecrated to be a Nazarite, desires to enter into covenant with those who have not even the consecration of circumcision, — and that against the law! He who was endowed to be a deliverer and champion of Israel against the national enemies, shall he become a friend of the tyrants, a member of one of their families? For the parents knew not, —

That this was of Jehovah, for it became an occasion of assailing the Philistines; and at that time the Philistines ruled over Israel. The parents could not but be painfully affected, for they knew not what the consequence would be. But although ignorant on this point, they nevertheless yielded. They unconsciously submit to the stronger spirit of Samson; and thus their indul-

1 [Ker.: It is true that in Ex xxiv. 16 and Deut. vii. 3 f. only marriages with Canaanitish women are expressly forbidden; but the ground of the prohibition extended equally to marriages with daughters of the Philistines. For the same reason, in Josh. xiii. 3, the Philistines also are reckoned among the Canaanites. — Tr.]

gence united with the unconscious longing of their son to bring about the fulfillment of what the angel had announced.

The career of Samson is an historical drama without a parallel. Its dark background is the national life out of which he emerges. Israel is under Philistine oppression, because of sin and consequent enervation. It is not without resentment against the enemy, but it lacks spirit. It prefers slavish peace to a freedom worth making sacrifices for. It hates the national enemies, but it holds illicit intercourse with them. Such a national life in itself can beget no heroes, nor use them when they exist.

The influence of this national life is evident in Samson himself. He has unequalled spirit, strength, and courage; but he is alone. The young man finds no sympathy, at which to kindle himself. There are no patriots in search of heroes. There is no national sorrow, that waits longingly for deliverance and a deliverer, and in consequence thereof recognizes him when he appears. On the contrary, luxury and sensuality prevail, eating away the heart of the rising generation; for national character also is wanting, by which, conscious of their power, Israel's youth might clearly recognize their proper goal. Samson too had perished in sensuality, which does not distinguish between friend and foe; but his genius has a seal that cannot be broken. The consecration on his head preserves in his soul an impulse that cannot miss its goal. The law of this consecration is freedom. For freedom's sake, it lends him strength and spirit. Hannibal's father made him when but a boy swear everlasting war against the Romans. Samson, as Nazarite from his birth, is borne onward, less consciously, but even more surely, to a hatred with which he is not acquainted, and to wrath and battle for the freedom of Israel.

Samson is without an army, without a congenial popular spirit, without sympathy and courage on the part of his countrymen,—not even Gideon's three hundred are with him; he has no teacher and spiritual leader; he is alone, and moreover exposed to every temptation to which gigantic strength and corporal beauty give rise; but in his consecration to God he has a guidance that does not lead astray. Hence, that by which others are fettered and subjected, becomes for him the means of attaining his destiny. The paths on which others go to destruction, for him become highways of victory and of strength. It is an act of national treason, when he takes a Philistine wife; and yet for him, it becomes the occasion for deeds in behalf of national freedom.

There is no historical drama in which the nobility and invincible destiny of a great personality, reveal themselves so luminously as in the life of Samson.

It is well known that in the history and fiction of all nations, as in the heroic poems of all ages, love for women has formed a chief motive for conflict and adventure. Even the circumstance which throws so great a charm over the lives and contests of the heroes to whom it appertains, that their love breaks through the confines of their own nation or party, and attaches itself to women who live within the circle of the enemy, is constantly recurring. But in those narratives, as also in the Persian legend, where Rudabe, the mother of Rustem, is the daughter of her Iranian lover's hereditary foe, and as in Tasso's Jerusalem Delivered, in Romeo and Juliet, and in the dramas of Schiller,—love is the central point and principal motive. Political barriers, national hatreds, ancient passions, all must yield to love, whether it ends in joy or tragedy. How different is its position in the history of Samson! The antagonism between Israel and the Philistines is justified and commanded. Truth cannot intermix itself with idolatry. The overleaping by sensuality of the spiritual barriers between the two, is the cause of Israel's sunken condition. That love through which Samson desires the maiden of Timnah, can be no joyful goal. Hence, the relation of his inborn heroism to love shows itself to be very different from that which obtains in heathenism and romance. There, the exploits of heroism become the occasions of love; for Samson, romance becomes the occasion of heroism. There, love overleaps the lines that separate nationalities; in Samson's case, it becomes the occasion by which he becomes mindful of the separation. Elsewhere, weakness, sensuality, enjoyment, become the snares which bind the inflamed hero; but for Samson, they become only the occasion for rending asunder the fetters, and for understanding the purpose for which he is endowed with divine strength.

And at that time the Philistines ruled over Israel. The addition of this remark is by no means superfluous. It serves to indicate the background of all Samson's deeds. The mere fact that the Philistines ruled, demonstrated Israel's apostasy and punishment; that they continued to rule, was evidence of Israel's powerlessness and inability to repent. It was because they ruled, and Israel was without repentance, that Samson appears so different from Gideon and Jephthah. In the midst of the Philistine supremacy, he enters on his single-handed conflict with them. Notwithstanding that they ruled by means of Israel's own sin, the objective power of the divine law and spirit evinces itself in the hero-nature of Samson, almost against his own will.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

[BUSH: "I wish," says an old divine, "that Manoah and his wife could speak so loud that all our Israel could hear them." By nothing is the heart of a pious parent more grieved than by the prospect of the unequal yoking of his children with profane or irreligious partners; for he knows that nothing is so likely to prove injurious to their spiritual interests, and subject them to heartrending trials. — Bp. HALL: As it becomes not children to be forward in their choice, so parents may not be too peremptory in their denials. It is not safe for children to overrun parents in settling their affections; nor for parents (where the impediments are not very material) to come short of their children, when the affections are once settled: the one is disobedience; the other may be tyranny. — TR.]

CHAPTER XIV. 5-9.

- 5 Then went Samson [And Samson went] down, and his father and his mother, to Timnath [Timnathah], and [they] came to the vineyards of Timnath [Timnathah]
6 and behold, a young lion roared against him [came to meet him, roaring]. And the Spirit of the Lord [Jehovah] came mightily [suddenly] upon him, and he rent him as he would have rent [as one rends] a kid, and he had nothing in his hand.
7 but [and] he told not his father or his mother what he had done. And he went down, and talked with the woman; and she pleased Samson well [was pleasing in the eyes of Samson]. And after a time he returned to take her, and he turned aside to see the carcass of the lion: and behold, there was a swarm of bees and honey in the carcass of the lion. And he took thereof in his hands, and went on [,] eating [as he went], and came to his father and mother, and he gave them, and they did eat: but he told not them [them not] that he had taken the honey out of the carcass of the lion.

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Ver. 5. And Samson went down, with his father and mother, to Timnathah. The parents give way; at all events, they now first go down, with Samson, to see the maiden, and ascertain more about her. The proper object of the journey appears from ver. 7, where we are told that Samson "talked with the woman, and she pleased him." Hitherto he had only seen her (ver. 1). His parents urge him to "speak with her," in order to convince himself of her character;<sup>1</sup> and he determines to do so. On this account, the statement of ver. 3 is repeated in ver. 7: "she pleased him" now, after speaking with her, as formerly after seeing her; he therefore persists in his suit, and appoints the time of his marriage. The hope of the parents that the woman, by her want of agreeableness and spirit, would discourage their son, is not realized. No such want seems to have existed, so far as he was concerned.

And a young lion came to meet him, roaring. Samson went to Timnathah to look for a wife, not to engage in a lion-hunt. The comparison of his lion-fight with that of Hercules in Nemea, is altogether superficial and uncritical; and the idea that his victory is to be regarded as the first of twelve exploits,<sup>2</sup> has no foundation either in his spirit or history. The Nemean victory, as I hope yet to show elsewhere, is the expression of a mythical symbolism, and is accordingly, to a certain extent, an epos complete in itself. Samson's conflict with the lion is an incidental occurrence. It was neither the object of his expedition originally, nor did it come to be its central point of interest afterwards. The chief difference between the two stories lies in the totally different vocations of the heroes: Hercules wrestles with beasts, conquers the hostility which, according to the Hellenic myth, inheres in Nature; Samson is a conqueror of men, a national hero who triumphs over the enemies of his people and their faith, a champion of freedom, whose strength is so great that he can well afford to expend a little portion of it in a passing encounter with a lion. Samson is not elected to take the field against lions and foxes, — that would never have given him a name in the history of Israel; but his strength and dexterity are great enough to enable him to make use of even lions and foxes, dead or alive, as means of his national conflict. Among his exploits, only the blows are reckoned, which he inflicted on the Philistines, — not the occasional means which he employed in their delivery. As little as David's royal vocation was rooted in the battles of his shepherd days with lions and bears, so little was Samson's destiny as a hero the outgrowth of his victory over the lion whom he did not seek, but who quite unexpectedly roared out against him. He had left his parents a little space, and when near the vine hills of Timnathah had entered into a wilderness skirting the road, when the monster rushed upon him.

Ver. 6. And the Spirit of Jehovah came upon him, וַיָּבֹא רוּחַ יְהוָה. The peculiar force of וַיָּבֹא is, that it expresses the fortuitousness of an occurrence, its happening just at the right time. In the very moment of need, the "Spirit of Jehovah" came upon him. In five passages where the expression "Spirit of Jehovah" occurs (ch. iii. 10; vi. 34; xi. 29; xiii. 25, and here), the Chaldee translation renders it "spirit of heroic strength" (geburah); for God also is a Gibbor, a Hero, and the translator wishes in this way to distinguish between the spirit of prophecy, the spirit of divine speech, which was also a spirit of God (cf. e. g., the Targum on Num. xxiv. 2-xxvii. 11, and also 1 Sam. x. 6, etc., רוּחַ יְהוָה), and the spirit of heroic action. But the original, very justly, makes no distinction; for in the view of divine doctrine all that man does is referred to the Spirit-source. Nothing succeeds without God. Samson needs that moral strength which does not fear the lion. The might, not of his arms, but of his soul, was of the first importance. For courageous undertakings, there is need of divine inspirations. Hence, the attack of Samson on the lion is here ascribed to an impulse of the Spirit of God, as well as Jephthah's resolution to attack Ammon in his own country (ch. xi. 29). And it is to be further noted, that in every case the expression is, not the Spirit of Elohim, but the Spirit of Jehovah; for it was He on whom Israel was to believe, and from whom, for his own glory and the salvation of Israel, proceeded the power which Samson possessed against the enemies who knew not Jehovah.

Cf. Danz, Baptismus Prosestorum, § 26; Meuschen, Nov. Test. in Talm., p. 268.

And he rent him. It was a terrible lion that came to meet him: a קפיר, a term especially used when the rapacious and bloodthirsty nature of the lion is to be indicated. Bochart explains the compound name קפיר אציל very beautifully by means of קרי אציל, especially here, where the fierceness of the lion is opposed to the weakness of a hoedus, kid of the goats. קפסע is equivalent to קלע, to rend asunder. As the lion comes rushing towards him, Samson awaits him, seizes him, and rends his jaws asunder. And this he did as easily as if it were a kid of the goats. For the remark, "as one rends a kid," does not imply that it was customary always to rend kids in this manner, but simply means that a kid could not have been more easily overcome than this powerful lion was. According to some ancient statements, Hercules choked the Nemean lion in his arms; and it is undoubtedly with reference to this that Josephus says of Samson also, that he strangled (ἔρξατο) the monster. According to a French romance, Iwain, the romantic hero of the Round Table, derived his epithet, "Knight of the Lion," from the fact that after a long struggle he had choked a lion: "il prist Lionian parmi la gorge as poinz . . . si l'estrangla." Cf. Holland, Chretien de Troyes, p. 161.

And he had nothing in his hand. He had gone forth to look for a wife, not expecting a battle. If, however, it be nevertheless surprising that a young man like Samson carried no weapons, we are to seek for the reason of it in the domination of the Philistines. Those tyrants suffered no weapons in the hands of the conquered, and hindered and prohibited the introduction of them and the traffic in them (cf. 1 Sam. xiii. 20). The suspicion of the enemy had found matter enough for its exercise, if young men like Samson had come armed into their cities. But even without arms, the heroic strength of Samson everywhere evinces itself; for not iron, but the Spirit, gives victory. Pausanias (vi. 5) tells of Polydamas, a hero of Scotussa in Elis, who lived about 400 B. C., that he overcame a great and strong lion on Olympus, without a weapon of any kind.

And he told not his father or his mother what he had done. It is certainly instructive to institute a comparison between Samson and the numerous lion-conquerors of history and tradition. For it reveals Samson's greatness of soul in a most significant way. To him, the victory over the lion is precisely not one of the twelve labors which in the Hellenic mythus is glorified by tradition and art. He wears no lion's skin in consequence of it. He makes so little ado about it, that he does not even inform his parents of it, probably in order not to startle them at the thought of the danger to which he has been exposed. For, at that time, he could not yet have thought of his subsequent fanciful conceit. There is nothing unusual about his appearance and demeanor, when he again overtakes them. He exhibits neither excitement nor uncommon elation. The divine spirit that slumbered in him has just been active; but the deed he performed under its impulse appeared to him, as great deeds always do to great souls, to have nothing of a surprising character about it, but to be perfectly natural. Others are impressed to astonishment by what to such persons are but natural life utterances. What we call geniality, what in Samson appears as the result of divine consecration, cannot exhibit itself more beautifully. It is the fullness of spirit and strength in men, out of which exploit and heroism flow as streams flow from their sources. To this very day, it is only small spirits, albeit often in thick books, who watch like griffons over each little thought that occurs to them, fearing to lose the mirror in which they see themselves reflected, and the lion-skin with which proprietorship invests them. Of Samson's victory nothing had ever been heard, had it not furnished him with the means for indulging in a national raillery against the Philistines.

What subjects of ostentation these conflicts with lions have everywhere been. Neither the great Macedonian nor the Roman Emperors, could dispense with them. An Alexandrian poet procured for himself a life-long pension from the Emperor Hadrian, by showing him a flowering lotus sprung from the blood of a lion whom the Emperor had slain. (More definite references to this and following passages, as also discussions of them, will be contained in my Hierozoicon. Other material, being already found in Bochart and the older commentators (cf. Scrarius ad locum), may here be passed over.) The extravagance of the later writers of romance, both eastern and western, was no longer content with common lion-encounters for their heroes. The Arabian Antar conquers a lion although the hero's feet are fettered. For Rustem and Wolfdieterich such exploits are performed even by their horses. It was only when the crusades put the knightly spirit to the test in the land of the lion, that Europeans experienced the historical terribleness of such conflicts. And few of them had the strength and resoluteness of Godfrey of Bouillon, who stood his ground against a bear, or of the bold and powerful Wicker von Schwaben, who, near Joppa, killed a great lion with the sword in his hand (Albert Aquisensis, vii. 70; Wilken, Gesch. der Kreuzzüge, ii. 109). Yet these men are not myths, because such deeds are ascribed to them; nor do we suspect only mythical echoes in the stories that are told of them.

The deed of Samson is executed with such ease and freedom, and represented with such simplicity and naturalness, that if the narrative were not historical, it would be impossible to account for its origin. And yet, according to some, it is a mythical reflection of the legend concerning Hercules. The theories of these critics have their false basis in the Hellenistic one-sidedness by which the relation, according to which the myth must receive its symbols from nature and history, is often quite reversed, so that historical life-utterances are attenuated into ideas and mythical phantasies. It is as easy to show that every lion-conqueror, down to Gérard of our own days, — yea, that all menageries to the contrary notwithstanding, the lion himself must be declared mythical, as it is to prove that Samson's encounter with a lion, in a region where the animal was then indigenous, related without the least approach to ostentation, and performed in the greatness of an unassuming spirit, cannot be historical.

Ver. 8. And after a time he returned. The betrothal had taken place, the wedding was to follow.<sup>1</sup> Samson and his parents descended the same road again. As the hero came to the spot where on their recent journey he turned off from the road, and had the adventure with the lion, the incident came again into his mind, and he turned aside once more, in order to see what had become of the dead lion. Then he found that a swarm of bees had settled themselves in the skeleton of the beast.

The swarm of bees is significantly spoken of as the עֲצַת דְּבָרִים, the congregation of bees. Commonly, דָּבָר designates the congregation of the Israelitish people, as regulated by the law. It is only on account of its wonderful social organization that a swarm of bees, but no other brute multitude,<sup>2</sup> was denoted by the same name.<sup>3</sup> Horapollo, in his work on Hieroglyphics (lib. i. 62), informs us that when the Egyptians wished to picture the idea of a people of law (πρωτονομος λαός), they did it by the figure of a bee.

The skeleton of the lion had been thoroughly dried up by the heat, for which process, as Oedmann<sup>4</sup> long ago remarked, scarcely twenty-four hours are required in the East. In this case many days had intervened. That bees readily settle in situations like the present, long since freed from all offensive odors, is well known from what expositors have adduced from Bochart and others. The instance of the swarm found settled in the head of the slain Onesilus, in Amathus, may also, familiar as it is, be alluded to (Herodot. v. 114). The opinion of the ancients, that bees originate out of the carcasses of steers, wasps out of those of asses, and other insects out of dead horses and mules, may perhaps have some connection with the observation of phenomena like that which here met Samson's eye (cf. Voss, Idololatria, lib. iv. p. 556, and others).

Bees must have a place of refuge from the weather. It has been observed, in recent times, that at present the bees of southern Palestine are smaller in size, and of a lighter yellow brown color than those of Germany (Ritter, xvi. 283). The term דְּבַשׁ, honey, is connected with דְּבַרִּי, bee (by an interchange of r and s). It is a remarkable fact, to which I have already directed attention in my Berlin Wochenblatt, 1863, that our German [and by consequence, our English] names for wax and honey are perfectly identical with the Semitic terms for the same objects, although in an inverted relation. The Hebrew דְּבַשׁ (pronounce: dash), honey, answers to the German Wachs (O. H. G. wahs), English, "wax;" and the Hebrew דֹּגָן (donag), wax, to the German Honig (honey), English, "honey;" and this is the only proper explanation to be given of the etymology of these German words.

Ver. 9. And he took thereof. The word וָיָקַח,

according to my view, has nothing to do either with a signification "to tread," or with the idea of "seizing," "making one's self master of;" but has preserved its original meaning in the later usus linguae of the Mishna and Talmud, where it bears the signification "to draw out," as bread is drawn out of the oven. The examples given by Buxtorff are borrowed from the Aruch of R. Nathan (172 a), where they may be found still more plain. Of bread in the oven it is said, וְיָצַק בָּרֶזֶק,

"it is drawn out and put into the basket." R. Nathan also justly explains our passage by this signification. For Samson, in like manner, drew the honeycomb out of the hive, and put it on the palm of his hand (וְיָצַק). Kimchi takes it in the same way (in his dictionary of roots, sub voce, near the close). Hence also, מִרְדָּה, mirda, is the oven-fork, with which things are drawn out of the fire, Latin rutabulum. It is easily seen that a widely diffused root comes to view here (comp. forms like rutrum, rutellum, from eruo, erutum, Greek ῥύω, ῥύρη, ῥύρα, etc.).

He drew out the honey, and as he had no other vessel, took it on his hand, and refreshed himself with it in the heat of the day, as Jonathan strengthened himself with it after the battle (1 Sam. xiv. 29). He also gave to his parents, who likewise relished it; but neither did he now tell them whence he had taken it. It would have involved telling them the history of the encounter with the lion; and though they might not now have been terrified by it, they would doubtless have caused a great deal of talk about it.

Roskoff,<sup>5</sup> in his book Die Simsonssage und der Heraklesmythos, 1860, p. 65, thinks that the circumstance of Samson's eating of honey taken from the lion's skeleton, is a proof that the rule by which the Nazirite was required to abstain from anything unclean had not yet received its later extension, and that consequently the Mosaic law was not yet in existence. We cannot regard this position as very well founded. For this reason, if no other, that the Book which is intimately acquainted with the Mosaic law, relates this act of Samson without the addition of any explanatory remark. And it has very good reason for adding no explanation; for the objection proceeds upon a view of Samson's Nazaritic character which is foreign to the Book, and greatly affects the proper understanding of his history. The truth is, the hero was not at all such a Nazirite as the sixth chapter of Numbers contemplates. The introduction to his history clearly shows that definite prescriptions concerning food and drink were given only to his mother; concerning himself,<sup>6</sup> nothing more is said than that no razor is to come upon his head. It is only upon this latter obligation, as the history shows, that the strength of his Nazariteship depends. The Nazariteship, abstractly considered, is an image of the general priesthood. On Samson particularly there rests a glimmer of that gospel freedom, with reference to which the Apostle says to the disciples: "All things are yours." From the consecration of his spirit, Samson has a typical strength by which to the pure all things are pure. Samson can do everything, and that, as the ancients explained of their Samson-Nazarite, without sin-offerings; only one thing he may not do,—desecrate this his consecration, sin against this spirit itself. But this his freedom is naturally held within bounds by his calling. It must have war against the Philistines for its cause and goal. The Apostle's meaning is, All things are yours, if ye be Christ's. Samson may do everything, when the honor of his God against the hereditary enemy is at stake. This freedom was given him, not that he might live riotously, as with Delilah—for which reason he fell—but only to do battle. Herein lies the key to the profound observation of the narrator, when the parents of Samson did not approve of his proposed marriage with the woman of Timnah: "They knew not that this was an occasion from God." The whole Samson was an occasion from God against the Philistines. It is therefore also with a profound purpose that the hero himself is not commanded to abstain from wine and unclean things. He is born, to a certain extent, in a state of pure consecration, in which for the ends of this consecration everything becomes pure to him. He continues to be the hero, even when he eats that which is unclean, and marries foreign women, which yet, according to ch. iii. 6, forms one of the causes of divine judgments; but he falls, when in divulging his secret he does that which, though not in itself forbidden, profanes his consecration.

Samson's character, in that spiritual freedom which makes war on the Philistines, is a type of the true Christian freedom,—so long as it does not consume itself.

It would therefore lead to useless hair-splitting, to inquire whether it was right in Samson to bring of the honey to his parents without telling them whence he had taken it. He brought it as an evidence of his childlike heart, and committed no wrong. It was a Talmudic question, whether the honey was unclean, although the rule enjoined on Samson's mother extended only to the time of her son's birth. He was silent about the history of the honey, in order to avoid boasting.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Samson is stronger than lions and more cunning than foxes. He must be this in order to conquer the Philistines. For there is no one to assist him. The Philistines have enervated, terrified, desecrated Israel. Israel, on their account, has no more faith in its faith. It is afraid of the strength of its own spirit. Desirous of peace at any price, it has surrendered even its own sentiments and beliefs.

Beautiful, on this account, is the use which the ancient church made of Samson the Lion-slayer as a type of Christ. The rending lion is also an image of Satan, the destroyer of men. As Samson rends the lion's jaws asunder with his hands, so Christ tears to pieces the kingdom of Satan and death. Hence the old custom of putting the picture of Samson the Lion-conqueror on church doors. But that lion who goes about seeking to snatch us away from Christ is still ever terrible. The battle with him is still daily new. The victory, however, is sure, if only we believe in the conquest of the true Samson. But if we have the Spirit only on our tongues, and not in our souls, we shall never conquer like Him. Only faith will enable us to stand. But every victory flows with honey; and with it we refresh father and mother. Every new victory strengthens the old love.

STARKE: They who do the greatest works, make the least noise and boasting about them. Enmity and war are easily begun, but not so easily ended. The Philistines could readily make an enemy of Samson, but to make a friend of him was more difficult.—THE SAME: Christian, imitate, not Samson's deed, but his faith and obedience.—LISCO: Samson's life and deeds can be rightly judged only when viewed, not as those of a private person, but as the activity of a theocratic deliverer and judge.

[WORDSWORTH: "He told not his father or his mother," though they were not far from him at the time (ver. 5). So our Lord would not that any one should spread abroad his fame. He said, "Tell no man" (Matt. viii. 4; xvi. 20). Hitherto, then, Samson, in his spiritual gifts, in his self-dedication to God, in his strength, courage, and victory, and in his meekness and humility, is an eminent type of Christ. But afterwards he degenerates, and becomes in many respects a contrast to Him. And thus, in comparing the type and the antitype, we have both encouragement and warning, especially as to the right use to be made of spiritual gifts, and as to the danger of their abuse.—BP. HALL: The mercies of God are ill bestowed upon us, if we cannot step aside to view the monuments of his deliverances; dangers may be at once past and forgotten. As Samson had not found his honeycomb, if he had not turned aside to see his lion, so we shall lose the comfort of God's benefits, if we do not renew our perils by meditation.—TR.]

CHAPTER XIV. 10-14.

10 So [And] his father went down unto the woman: and Samson made there a 11 feast; for so used [it is customary for] the young men to do. And it came to pass, when they saw him, that they brought [chose] thirty companions to be with 12 him. And Samson said unto them, I will now put forth a riddle unto you: if ye can certainly [if ye indeed] declare it me within the seven days of the feast, and find it out, then I will give you thirty sheets [shirts] and thirty change [changes]

- 13 of garments: But if ye cannot declare it me, then shall ye give me thirty sheets [shirts] and thirty change [changes] of garments. And they said unto him, Put forth thy riddle, that we may hear it. And he said unto them, Out of the eater came forth meat, and out of the strong came forth sweetness. And they could not in three days expound the riddle.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 12. — קְדִינִים. Dr. Cassel translates this word by the general term Gewende, garments. He apparently considers the only distinction between the קְדִינִים and the חֲלִילֵת יְקָדִים, to be that between common and more costly garments (see below). But the קְדִינִים are probably under-garments, tunics, shirts, made of a fine linen. The derivation of the word קְדִין, and whether it be related to the Greek κινδύς (Sept.), can hardly be determined. — Tr.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Ver. 10. And his father went down unto the woman. The whole narrative is full of naive delineations of manners and customs. The father's present visit to the maiden is in his son's behalf, and expresses the parental approbation of Samson's marriage engagement. That the parents of the bride were consulted about the marriage is not indicated in any way, although we know that the father was still living (cf. ch. xv. 6). Are we to suppose that among the Philistines an application to the parents was unnecessary? Did not Isaac, through Eliezer, make suit for Rebecca to her father? and Jacob to Laban? Was not the same custom current also among other, heathen nations? Is not the young woman in the nuptial song of Catullus (Carmen, xii. ver. 61) exhorted that it is the father and mother who must be obeyed? The Philistine women seem really to have enjoyed a position of great social freedom. They are seen on the street, and are visited by men, without being on that account regarded as "harlots."

And Samson made there a feast; for such is the custom of young men. He did not take her with him into his father's house,<sup>2</sup> after the marriage was settled, but remained in Timnah, and there gave the feast. Among the Philistines it was customary for the bridegroom (קַדְדָן) to arrange the banquet. At the wedding of Cana, also, described by St. John (ch. ii. 10), the bridegroom seems to have been the entertainer. But this was not the case when Laban gave his daughter to Jacob, or when Tobias married the daughter of Raguel (Tobit, viii. 19). In those instances, the parents of the bride give the feast.

Marriage feasts were much liked among all nations. When, in the Odyssey (iv. 3), Telemachus comes to king Menelaus, the latter is just celebrating the nuptial feasts of his children. Among the Romans, the name repotia<sup>3</sup> was in use for the entertainments which (according to Festus) were given on the day after the marriage at the new husband's house (cf. Horace, Sat. ii. 60). Plutarch makes the question, Why even law-givers have appointed a certain degree of luxury to be observed in connection with such feasts, a subject of discussion in his Symposium (lib. iv. quæst. 3). Samson's marriage-celebration lasted seven days. The parents-in-law of Tobias, in their joy, appropriated fourteen days. But down to late times luxury and sensuality are more characteristic of such feasts than is compatible with their proper observance. Neither the spirit of Samson, nor the piety of Tobias fills and governs them, albeit in some instances the duration of those ancient celebrations may be rivaled. We hardly seem to have taken a long leap backward, when in the fourteenth century we hear it provided by the Ravensburg Regulation concerning weddings, that "the nuptial celebration shall only last till the next day, no longer" (Birlinger, Volksthumliches, ii. 399); or when, in 1643, the Würzburg bishop, John Philip, orders that the custom of protracting banquets through three days be discontinued, "as a useless and hurtful expense" (Schaltjahr, i. 445). For even in our day, like excesses occur, wherever there is money and wantonness. So late as ten years ago, it was stated that in Swabia the feasting attendant upon a village wedding still frequently lasted from four to five days (Meier, Schwab. Sagen, p. 479).

Ver. 11. And when they saw him, they chose thirty companions, who were with him. A bridegroom is like a king's son. His wedding is his coronation. Hence, also, crown and chaplet are not wanting for the wedded pair. For the same reason they have also a following. These are ancient, universally diffused ideas, which it would lead us too far to collect together from all nations and languages. In comparatively recent times, the Jews have minutely traced the analogy of the bridegroom with the king, through all the customs pertaining to them respectively, even to the point of calling attention to the fact that קָדֵן and קָדֵן have each three letters. (On the proofs that חֲתָן דּוּמַח לַמֶּלֶךְ,<sup>4</sup> compare the liturgical works, of which Tania, ed. Cremona, 1565, p. 130, and Taschbaz, of R. Meier of Rotenburg, p. 45, may here be especially cited.)

Accordingly, the קִרְיָוֹתָם, "when they saw him," is to be so understood, that when Samson appeared, i. e. publicly, both at the time of the marriage, concerning the manner of which nothing is said, and during the seven festive days, it was always with a retinue of thirty companions, somewhat as in our day brides are still attended by suites of bridesmaids.

וַיִּקְרָאוּ, and they chose. It was customary, no doubt, when a daughter or son of the city was married, for the bridegroom to provide himself with a retinue. As Samson was a stranger, his

<sup>2</sup> Because she was an alien. He does not impose upon his father's house that in which he allows himself. That would have been an insult to the law and customs of Israel.

bride and her father told him whom to invite, and therefore the writer says "they chose." The number of young men chosen was thirty. Samson's parents seem to have been in good circumstances, and hence the bridegroom appeared not without splendor, as the giver of a seven days' feast. That thirty was the unvarying number, cannot be maintained. The ancients had a philosophical number, which they called the "wedding," and which consisted of five or six. (Both chosen on account of their being formed from  $2 \times 3$  and  $2 + 3$ , one even, the other odd.) But  $5 \times 6$  is also = 30.<sup>1</sup> In later times, also, the Jews had many bridesmen. In Worms, their number had been restricted to eight. The later Jews called such a bridesman ששכין, which term does not, however, come from the Syriac, as Sachs thought (Beiträge, i. 82), but is only the Hebraized form of sponsor (otherwise ausper, paranymphios, cf. Matt. ix. 15). — The idea of Josephus, which Bertheau adopts, that the thirty young men were to watch Samson, is to be rejected. For, in the first place, nothing was as yet known concerning Samson that could render him so seriously suspected; and, in the next place, it is manifest from ver. 15, that they were invited on the part of the bridegroom himself.

Vers. 12, 13. I will put forth a riddle unto you. The custom of propounding riddles for amusement is very ancient. The acuteness which exercised itself therein, was, as it were, the counterpart of that which invented the language of figure, signs, and symbols. For it brought to light again the secrets which the latter had locked up. "In ancient times," says Plutarch, "the Greeks were already in the habit of propounding riddles to each other." It is related of the maiden Cleobuline, the daughter of a wise man, that she was so ingenious, as to play with riddles as if they were dice, propounding or solving them with equal ease. The banquet of the seven wise men, in Plutarch, shows the high estimation in which the diversion was held; and Cleodemus, the physician, who was unskillful at solving riddles, is not unsightly rebuked by Æsop, for holding such occupation to be suitable only for girls when engaged in knitting girdles and hoods, but not for intelligent men. Athenæus, also, in his work (pp. 453-459), cites large extracts from the book of Clearchus on riddles, and adds, "that the unraveling of such riddles is very similar to the pursuit of philosophy, and that therefore their solution, as a sign of wisdom, is held in favor, and deemed an appropriate mode of entertainment at table." We, however, pass by these examples from Clearchus, not only because they were already brought to the notice of expositors by Bochart, but especially because in the case of Samson's riddle the real stake at issue is higher than a garland for the winner, or the drinking of a forfeit-cup<sup>2</sup> by the loser. It evokes a stern conflict.

Then I will give you thirty garments (שְׁלִישִׁים) and thirty changes of raiment (שְׁלִישִׁים בְּגָדִים). With this explanation, the more recent expositors would probably agree. By a "change" of raiment we are to understand a dress of state — a Sunday suit, as we would say — for which the every-day dress may be exchanged on festive occasions. The Targum, however, has another explanation, which deserves to be mentioned. Like the Septuagint and Josephus, it translates שְׁלִישִׁים (changes) by שְׁלִישִׁים, στάλη; assuming thereby for שְׁלִישִׁים, a signification which indeed it sometimes seems to have, namely, to fight, to wound (Sept. παράσσειν, τερνέσκειν). For στάλη is the classical term for a soldier's dress. In like manner, it translates שְׁלִישִׁים by פלדסים, i. e. balleus, the girdle or belt which the soldier buckled around his body (cf. 2 K. v. 23). — It was thus no small price that was put upon the solution of the riddle. But in other cases also it was probably not unusual for large sums to be staked. Thus, if we are to believe Dios, quoted by Josephus (Antiq. viii. 5, 3; cf. Jablonski, Pantheon Egypt., Proleg., p. cxiv), Solomon and Hiram lost a great deal of money to each other. Plutarch relates how that the Ethiopian king staked many cities and villages on a riddle propounded to Amasis, and would have won them, had not the philosophical Bias come to the aid of the Egyptian monarch. It was in consequence of solving a riddle that the legendary Persian hero was permitted to marry Rudabe, the mother of Rustem. According to ancient Scandinavian law, criminals could save themselves from death by means of a riddle (Olin Dalin, Gesch. Schwedens, German, i. 155). The same idea occurs in German riddle-books (Simrock, Räthselbuch, p. 463; Menzel, d. Dichtung, i. 427). — King Heidrik in Ridgotland had a severe war with Gester Blinde, king in Gothland. Finally, he challenged him to solve riddles. The latter invoked Odin, and conquered (Olin Dalin, i. 186).

Ver. 14. Out of the consumer came material for consumption, and out of the terrible came sweetness. The translator must take care not to destroy the ambiguity of the term אכל, consumer. For this reason, the rendering of De Wette and Arnheim, "vom Fresser kommt Frass" [from the feeder comes feed], is not good; for, on the one hand, Frass [feed, a term used only for the food of beasts]<sup>3</sup> is not applicable to the honey which is meant, and on the other hand, human beings [do not feed, but] eat. Ewald's rendering, "aus dem Esser kam ein Essen" [out of the eater came an eating, i. e. something eatable], is unsuitable, because the lion, who is meant, is not an Esser, eater, nor yet as Bertheau renders, a Speiser [both terms being used of human beings only]. Equally erroneous is it to translate אכל by "sour." For the antithesis between this word and קטרון is here to be taken in a wider sense, so as to give rise to a second equivoque; for קטרון means not only "sweet," but metaphorically also "pleasant," agreeable. The ingenuity of the riddle consists precisely in this, that the ambiguity both of its language and contents can be turned in every direction, and thus conceals the answer. It is like a knot whose right end cannot be found, — a figure

<sup>2</sup> That is, a cup of unmixed wine, or of wine mixed with salt-water, to be emptied at one draught. See Smith's Dict. Antiq., s. v. "Symposium." It will be remembered that the Greeks always mingled water with their wine. They considered it not only unhealthy, but barbarous, to

from which the sense of the Hebrew  $\text{רֶמֶס}$ , to propose a riddle, as also that of the Greek  $\gamma\rho\iota\pi\eta\sigma$  (cf.  $\gamma\rho\iota\pi\eta\sigma$ , the braided fishing net), is doubtless to be derived. The Gordian knot was likewise an emblematical riddle. Samson's problem distinguishes itself only by its peculiar ingenuity. It is short and simple, and its words are used in their natural signification ( $\text{אָכְלֵם}$  is to consume, in general, without regard to the specific form or nature of the consumption, and  $\text{אִי}$  is terrible, as "the strong one," whether in a good or evil sense, always is). It is so clear as to be obscure. It is not properly liable to the objection, that it refers to an historical act which no one could know. The act is one which was natural in that country. Its turning-point, with reference to the riddle, was, not that it was an incident of Samson's personal history, but that its occurrence in general was not impossible.

The ingenuity of the riddle shows itself further in that it applies equally well both to an historical occurrence and a mere abstract conception. This was a characteristic of ancient popular riddles in general, and indicates their origin. Just as it was an art to represent historical facts symbolically by pictures (of which the modern rebus is an insipid distortion), so it was an art out of such abstractions to disinter an historical fact. Most popular riddles call for the exercise of this art. The instance showing most likeness to the riddle proposed by Samson, is found in a story current in North Germany, and communicated by Müllenboff (Sagen, p. 504): A man was condemned to death. His wife intercedes for him. The judges offer to let him go, if she can propose a fiddle which they shall not be able to solve. The woman says: —

"As ik hin güng, as ik wedder kam,
Den Lebendigen ik wet den Doden nam.
Süss (Süß) de güngen de Saeuten (den Lebenden) quitt, Raet to, gy Herren, nu ist Tyt." 1

The woman had found the carcass of a horse by the way, and in it a bird's-nest, and in the nest six young birds. The six young ones she took with her, whereby these became quit of the seventh; and thus she had taken the living out of the dead. It went with the wise judges even as it did with the proud Philistines — they guessed nothing.

1 ["As I came along, I took the living out of the dead; six got quit of the seventh; guess away, my masters, now is the time." — Tr.]

CHAPTER XIV. 15-20.

- 15 And it came to pass on the seventh day, that they said<sup>1</sup> unto Samson's wife, Entice [Persuade] thy husband, that he may declare unto us the riddle, lest we burn thee and thy father's house with fire? have ye called [invited] us to take that we 16 have [plunder us]? is it not so? And Samson's wife wept before him and said, Thou dost but hate me, and lovest me not: thou hast put forth a [the] riddle unto the children [sons] of my people, and hast not told it me. And he said unto her,
17 Behold, I have not told it my father nor my mother, and shall I tell it thee? And she wept before him the seven days, while their feast lasted [during which they had their feast]: and it came to pass on the seventh day, that he told her, because she lay sore upon him [pressed him hard]: and she told the riddle to the children [sons]
18 of her people. And the men of the city said unto him on the seventh day before the sun went down, What is sweeter than honey? and what is stronger than a lion? And he said unto them, If ye had not ploughed with my heifer, ye had not
19 found out my riddle. And the Spirit of the Lord [Jehovah] came upon him, and he went down to Ashkelon, and slew thirty men of them, and took their spoil [attire], and gave [the] change [changes] of garments unto them which expounded
20 the riddle. And his anger was kindled, and he went up to his father's house. But [And] Samson's wife was given to his companion, whom he had used as his friend [who had attended him].

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 15. —  $\text{וַיֹּאמְרוּ}$ . Dr. Cassel treats all that comes after the phrase, "and it came to pass on the seventh day," down to the same phrase in ver. 17, as parenthetic, and consequently renders  $\text{וַיֹּאמְרוּ}$  by the pluperfect: "and they had said." Cf. below. — Tr.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

The æsthetic beauty and psychological truth which characterize the narrative notwithstanding its compressed brevity, and which would be incomparable even though the narrative were not found in the Bible, and had not divine truth for its contents and object, can scarcely be adequately pointed out, so manifestly do they manifest themselves. The drama is represented with such historical life-likeness, and its development is so natural, that while no one could foresee why the wedding should give rise to a conflict, yet in the sequel it becomes manifest that its occurrence was unavoidable. Samson really loved the maiden of Timnah, and took the full measure of youthful delight in the nuptial banquet and festival; but it is impossible for an Israelite, as he is, to enter into any kind of close connection with the enemies and oppressors of his people, without getting into a conflict. It must never be supposed that covenants, even in the simplest relations of life, can be made with those who are opponents in principle and tyrants in disposition. No occasion is so slight, but it suffices to inflame the fires of antagonism. Samson is too genial of nature to be a far-seeing party man; but he deceived himself when he expected to find a covenant of love and fidelity in a Philistine family. The preventing cause lay not only in his opponents, but also in himself, in that he was always, even unconsciously, showing who he was. Everything appeared to be harmonious when he propounded the riddle. He did it in the most peaceful spirit, from the impulse of an active mind. But it immediately brought the hidden antagonism to light. For they to whom it was proposed for solution were Philistines. As such, they would at all events be put to shame, if they failed to solve it. At the same time, it is true, the nobility of Samson's disposition reveals itself, in contrast with the vulgar natures of the Philistines. He, for his part, risks thirty times the value of what, in case of failure, each of the thirty has to pay. This is the very reason why, in their covetousness, they accept the wager. The result was natural. They cannot solve the riddle, but neither are they willing to admit this. They are too vain to be humbled by an alien, but especially too covetous to endure a loss. They therefore turn to Samson's young wife. Had she not been a Philistine, they would not have dared to do this. But, as it is, they expect to find in her an ally against the Israelite, even though he be her husband. She seems indeed to have resisted for a while,—until they arouse both her fears and her vanity. Her fears, by the threat to burn her father's house over her head; her vanity, by hinting that probably the riddle was only put forth in order to plunder the guests. The latter suspicion she may have found especially intolerable, women being ever peculiarly sensitive to similar surmises of village slander-mongers. Perhaps, however, she merely invented these threatening speeches afterwards, in order to pacify Samson. For else, why did she not confess the truth to Samson? That alone would have ended the trouble. Either he would have felt himself strong enough to protect her, and to humble the miserable enemies, or he would have consented to the sacrifice of appearing to be vanquished. But she did not do this, just because she did not forget that she was a Philistine. Samson, she conjectured, would not allow himself to be humbled. She sought, therefore, to persuade him by means of that very antagonism for the sake of which she betrayed him. She complained, weeping, that he still treated her like her countrymen, and also kept from her that which he would not tell them. She desires to make it appear that her love has so entirely brought her over to his interests, that she ought not to be put on the same footing with her countrymen. This would have been the right relation. The wife may assist no party but that of her husband. But she only dissembled, in order to betray. Finally, on the seventh day,—the sun was already declining,—she had so tormented the hero, that he told it to her. He had a heart not only great, but also tender, which at last succumbs to the prayers and tears of the wife whom he loves and holds to be true. The treachery is completed. The miserable Philistines act as if they had themselves found the solution, and claim the reward. Then a light goes up for Samson. He sees the whole contrast,—the incongruity and error of a covenant with Philistines. Before the treason of which he has been made the subject, the mists with which a seductive sensuality had obscured his vision are scattered. National wrath and national strength awake within him. His whole greatness reveals itself. He does not refuse the Philistines the promised reward. But the manner in which it is given, is full of contempt and humiliation. He throws to them the spoils of thirty slain Philistines. He leaves the woman, and returns to Israel. The conflict has begun, and Samson's true calling becomes manifest. He who wears the consecration of God on his head, cannot revel in the houses of Philistines.

Ver. 15. And it came to pass on the seventh day. More recent expositors have made no remarks on this difficult statement. To assume that the Philistines first applied themselves to the woman on the seventh day, is rendered impossible by ver. 17, which says that she wept before Samson "seven days." The LXX. therefore, read here, "on the fourth day," because ver. 14 states that for three days they were not able to find the solution. Considering how easily 7 and 4 may be interchanged, the substitution of "seven" for "four" appears very likely. But the clearer it seems that the reading should be, "on the fourth day," the more surprising it is that the Masora retained "on the seventh day." The Masora, however, supposed the Sabbath to be meant by the seventh day,—an opinion also followed by some of the older expositors (cf. Serarius), but which cannot be correct.<sup>1</sup> For in ver. 17 a "seventh day" is again mentioned, which cannot, however, be another Sabbath; for as the first "seventh day" is, by the supposition, the fourth, so this second is the seventh, day of the wedding-feast. The reading "on the seventh day" can be retained, if the passage which begins immediately after it in ver. 15, and extends to the same phrase in ver. 17, be regarded as a sort of parenthesis. The writer was already on the point of stating that after they had ineffectually puzzled over it for three days, Samson on the seventh day told it to his wife, when it occurred to him first to interpose the statements of vers. 15-17, as showing the motives by which Samson was influenced. Accordingly, "on the seventh day," in ver. 17, only continues what the same words in ver. 15 had begun. The statement in the parenthesis that she wept before him "seven days," falls in with this view. The idea is, that from the time at which she began, she continued to torment him throughout the whole seven-day period of the feast. Throughout the whole week, therefore, instead of cheerful guests, Samson had sullen Philistine faces, and, instead of a happy wife, crocodile tears and reproaches.<sup>2</sup>

Persuade thy husband, that he declare unto us the riddle. פָּתֵנִי, persuade; most frequently, it is true, "befool," "entice by flattery." Very significant is the expression, "that he declare unto us the riddle." If he tells it to her, they intimate, he will have told it to them. For do not they and she constitute an "us"? She belongs to them, and must act accordingly, if she would not incur their enmity against herself and her house.

Have ye invited us to plunder us? is it not so? הֲלִיָּרְשָׁנִי is the kal infinitive with suffix, and is to be derived from יָרַשׁ, to inherit, to get by conquest, to take into possession. The word is aptly chosen here. When Israel was taking possession of the land, יָרַשׁ was a word in constant use. The Philistines mockingly ask whether they were invited that Israel, in the person of Samson, might "conquer," "inherit," their property. הֲלִיָּ, at the close, is an interrogative particle, like the Latin ne, used enclitically.

Ver. 16. Thou dost but hate me, שָׂנֵאתָנִי. Samson, she intimates, must look on her as one looks on a person who belongs to a hostile tribe, seeing that he conceals the solution of the riddle from her as well as from the other people of the city. The woman, pressed to decide between her people and Samson, inclines to the Philistines. A lesson for Samson and others like him.

Behold, I have not told it my father nor my mother. It is true, he deferred not to father and mother in the matter of his marriage, but not from want of reverence for them. They are his most beloved. To them he brings of the honey. (Very insipidly, Josephus adds here that he brought honey to the woman also.) And the woman, in the midst of her flatteries and tears, must endure to hear him say to her: Have I not told it to my parents, and shall I tell it to thee? To be sure, it would have been inexcusable to have put his parents — and such parents! — on the same level with a Philistine woman.

Ver. 18. Before the sun went down. Here also we have the poetical name חֲרָפָה (instead of the form חֶרֶם), for the sun, cf. on ch. viii. 13. Beautiful is the expression בָּאוּ, to come, for "to set." The sun comes home, as it were — comes into his house, like a bridegroom after his wedding. On the other hand, when the sun rises, the Hebrew says that he "goes forth" into activity, forth for victory like a hero.

Had ye not ploughed with my heifer, ye had not found out my riddle. The answer of the angry Samson is elegantly couched in the form of a proverb, full of spirit, as are all his sayings which have been preserved. It starts from the experience that buried treasures come to light, ver. 17: "she wept before him seven days." The natural explanation seems to be this: As soon as the riddle was given, the young wife at once began to tease for its solution. Refusal both stimulated her curiosity and wounded her vanity, so that even before the end of the first day she had recourse to the argument of tears. Day by day she renewed the assault, but always ineffectually. Finally, on the seventh day she brings a new argument, furnished her by the guests. For the first three days of the festivities these had sought to solve the riddle in a legitimate way. Such appears to be the import of the remark in ver. 14: "and they could not in three days expound the riddle." What they did on the next three days is not stated. They when the soil is turned by the plough. (Tages, the Roman Genius, was fabled to have been thus ploughed up.) But not every one knows where to draw the furrow. The Philistines would not have known it; but his heifer had shown them the way. The comparison is not very flattering to the traitress, but quite appropriate. For no merit accrues to the heifer when it ploughs the right furrow: it has been shown to it. So also the woman: she has solved nothing, but only played the traitor.

Ver. 19. And he went down to Ashkelon, and slew thirty men of them. Why to Ashkelon? Against the people of Timnah he could not turn his wrath. He had eaten with them, and he would not withdraw himself from the obligations he had assumed. But their conduct had awakened him to a sense of the great national contrast between them and Israel. At this moment he felt that Israel lay in the bands of servitude. Between his people and the Philistines no other treaty existed, than that which is made by the cowardly and the God-forsaken with their enemies. Israel endured servitude, because it had fallen away from its ancient spirit. It ventured no longer on resistance.

All this came home to Samson's mind at this moment. He determined to give a proof of Israelitish strength. Hence we read, "the Spirit of Jehovah came upon him," a remark always found where Israel manifests a determination to lift up heart and hand against the enemies of God. His relations would have advised him to collect money and buy the garments. It was a divine inspiration which moved him to pay by battle. Why did he go to Ashkelon? Because there were rich and valiant men there, whom it was worth while to attack and overcome. Probably it was a nuptial party, graced, as his own had been, with thirty attendant groom's-men, that he surprised. It was not done in the midst of peace. There was no peace between Philistines and Israel. He conquered the thirty Philistines (members, perhaps as we have said, of a nuptial train) with the sword, as he vanquished his own retinue in a conflict of intellect. The fame of the wonderful young Israelite resounds through the land. No reprisals are made. The princes of the Philistines look on the occurrence as a private affair. But a silent quaking of consciences, such as seizes on tyrants when a fresh spirit stirs itself among the oppressed, contributed no doubt to the preservation of repose.

Took their attire, חֲלִיצוֹתָם. Chalitsath (חֲלִיצָה) is the military equipment, of which the fallen are stripped, cf. 2 Sam. ii. 21. There, the Sept. renders it πανοπλία; here, στέλην. This supports the opinion of the Targum, adduced above, that the promise of Samson referred to military garments. For the chaliphoth (changes of garments) which he paid, were doubtless part of the chalitsath, or military suits, which he took; so that Samson may have remained inactive, trusting in some way to compass the solution at last, or they may have been already ploughing with Samson's heifer. But if the latter, they had not yet recourse to threats. On the last day of the feast, however, when they find that waiting has been as ineffective as working, and that the wife's importunities (of which they were probably cognizant, even though they did not stimulate them), have likewise accomplished nothing, they resort to threats against the wife. The latter thereupon becomes more urgent and tearful than ever, and gains her point. Compare Bertheau and Kell, who give essentially the same explanation. — Tr.]

did not first sell his booty, and then buy new garments. It is in harmony with the dramatic course of the action, that Samson flung to his treacherous friends, as the price of their deception, garments snatched from their own countrymen.

And he went up to his father's house. His wrath blazed up into a national flame against the Philistine brood. He turns his back upon them, and goes home. It seems to be his intention never to come back. How little they were worthy of him, is shown by the conduct of the woman, after his departure. That she may not be without a husband in consequence of her treason, she is rewarded with the hand of another man. One of the companions for whose sake she deceived Samson, marries her. To treason she adds infidelity. Meanness of disposition gives birth to everything that is bad. It can neither love nor be faithful; but least of all can it comprehend a man such as Samson was.

A survey of only that which chapter xiv. shows of Samson, should have excited the attention of those who find pleasure in comparing him with Hercules. While all the ancient statements about the Greek hero have value only as the vehicles of mythico-symbolical ideas, Samson appears in the midst of history, wearing the living hues of actual existence. Hercules, the more the later Greeks take him historically, the more he assumes the character of a coarse giant and glutton, who, averse to culture, kills his master; while Samson is at once portrayed as a genial man, of noble disposition. It were more feasible to institute a comparison between Samson and many traits in the character of Ulysses, were it not that in the latter, as in Greek heroes generally, there is wanting the pathos of the national champion, and that elevation of spirit which, in the case of Samson, breaks through the fetters of even his deepest sensuality. It is already a misapprehension when some would assign twelve exploits to Samson, seeing that his whole life is given for a testimony; but when his slaying of the thirty Philistines is counted as the second (as e. g. by Bertheau), there is a want of understanding even of the Heracleian performances. These are a didactic poem; what is told of Samson, signifies an ethical deed. The deeds of Hercules have no mutual connection: those of Samson, ethico-historical in their nature, are conditioned one by the other. The succeeding history, related in chap. xv., connects itself with what has gone before.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

[HENRY (on vers. 10, 12): It is no part of religion to go contrary to the innocent usages of the places where we live; nay, it is a reproach to religion, when those who profess it give just occasion to others to call them covetous, sneaking, and morose. A good man should strive to make himself, in the best sense, a good companion. — THE SAME: "If ye had not ploughed with my heifer, you had not found out my riddle." Satan, in his temptations, could not do us the mischief he does, if he did not plough with the heifer of our own corrupt nature. — THE SAME: "And he went up to his father's house." It were well for us, if the unkindness we meet with from the world, and our disappointments in it, had but this good effect upon us to oblige us by faith and prayer to return to our heavenly Father's house, and rest there. — THE SAME: "Samson's wife was given to his companion, whom he had used as his friend." See how little confidence is to be put in man, when those may prove our enemies whom we have used as our friends. — BR. HALL (on ver. 19): If we wonder to see thirty throats cut for their suits, we may easily know that this was but the occasion of that slaughter whereof the cause was their oppression and tyranny.

WORDSWORTH: At the marriage feast of Cana in Galilee, Christ manifested forth his glory (John ii. 11). But at this marriage in Timnath, Samson betrayed the first signs of moral weakness and degeneracy. — TR.]

CHAPTER XV. 1-8.

- 1 But [And] it came to pass within a while after [after a while], in the time of wheat-harvest, that Samson visited his wife with a kid; and he said, I will go in to my wife into the chamber [the female apartment]. But her father would not suffer
- 2 him to go in. And her father said, I verily thought that thou hadst utterly hated her; therefore I gave her to thy companion: is not her younger sister fairer than
- 3 she? take her [be she thine], I pray thee, instead of her. And Samson said concerning [to] them, Now shall I be more [omit: more] blameless than [before] the
- 4 Philistines, though I do them a displeasure [do them evil]. And Samson went and caught three hundred foxes [jackals], and took fire-brands [torches], and turned
- 5 tail to tail, and put a fire-brand [torch] in the midst between two tails. And when he had set the brands [torches] on fire, he let them go [sent them off — i. e., the animals] into the standing corn of the Philistines, and burnt up both the shocks, and also the standing corn, with the vineyards and olives [with the olive-gardens].
- 6 Then the Philistines said, Who hath done this? And they answered, Samson, the son-in law of the Timnite, because he had taken [took] his wife, and given [gave] her to his companion. And the Philistines came up, and burnt her and her father with fire. And Samson said unto them, 'Though ye have done this [If ye act thus], yet will I [(I swear) that I will] be avenged of you, and after that I will cease. And he smote them hip [shank] and thigh with a great slaughter. And he went down and dwelt in the top [cleft] of the rock Etam.

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Vers. 1, 2. And it came to pass after some time. Samson's disposition was too noble to cherish anger long: only small souls bear grudges. But great natures measure others by themselves. Because they have forgotten the wrong that was done them, they think that others are no longer mindful of the wrong they have done. Samson feels as if nothing had happened. Kindly-disposed as ever, he comes to visit his wife. His conciliatory feeling declares itself in the present of a kid which he brings. His wife, it says, has nothing to fear. Conscious of harmless intentions, he wishes to enter her room (רָחֵץ is for the most part the inner apartment, where the women sleep). But this leads to the disclosure of how he has been treated. Her father does not allow him to enter, on the ground that she is no longer his wife, but another's. The injustice of the transaction thus disclosed was patent. For Samson's absence cannot have been long. He returned in the season of the wheat-harvest (mentioned on account of ver. 5), which fell perhaps in May. It is probable that in Palestine, as elsewhere, most weddings took place in the spring. Samson, at his departure, had not said that he would not return. His father-in-law excuses himself only by intimating that he thought he would not come back. The words of ver. 2 enable us almost to see the anxiety and fear with which the father seeks to exculpate himself before Samson, — whom he now knows better than formerly, — and under the influence of which he offers him his other daughter as indemnification. He cannot restore his wife for fear of the Philistines; and he fears him because of the injustice he has done him.

Ver. 3. And Samson said to them: This time I shall be blameless, etc. The greatness of his nature shows itself here also. To the fearful father he does no harm. Small heroism there would have been in that. He uses no violence — brings the man into no awkward relations with his countrymen. He remembers that his daughter has been his wife, love of whom has brought him there. Besides — and this again manifests the warrior of God in him — he speedily sinks all personal interests in the general interests of his people. At every conflict the consciousness of his divine vocation breaks forth. He turns his personal wrong into an occasion of a national exploit against the enemy of his people as a whole. The sign of consecration is upon his head in order to lead him on from small things to great, from things personal to those that are general, from objects of sense to things of the spirit, and to remind him of his call to be a hero for Israel against the Philistines.

of the jackals. It was finally concluded that a good pair of mittens had rendered useful service. Oedmann, Verm. Samml., ii. 32.

He said to them. To whom? To his own people — to his own family. Israel was utterly dispirited. The people did not feel deeply enough the disgrace in which they lived. Special grounds were wanting, in their view, to justify Samson's hostility against the Philistines. The Philistines were not harming them; why then attack them? Probably Samson's former exploit had been disapproved. He himself, they may have told him, had been to blame in the riddle-matter. None more law-abiding and careful than a slavish people that will make no sacrifices. Now, says Samson to them, have you still nothing to say? I have a cause; I have been undeniably wronged. It was the Philistines who forced my wife and her father to take the step they took. They did it because I am an Israelite. For what I now do against them I am not to be blamed. He thus takes advantage of the letter of personal rights in behalf of the spirit of general freedom. Since his people are insensible of their bondage, he makes his private affair the basis of a declaration of war.

Ver. 4. And he caught three hundred shualim (jackals, foxes). Samson found himself alone in his hostility against the Philistines. No one of his father's house followed him. He had not even three hundred men, like those that stood by Gideon. He turns, therefore, to the beasts of the forest for confederates. As bears come to the help of Elisha, so he, instead of three hundred soldiers, procures three hundred jackals,<sup>1</sup> and constitutes them his army against the national foe. It was an ancient and common war measure, still employed by the hostile tribes of the East, to set fire to the standing grain. The Lydian king Alyattes used this terrible means for twelve successive years against the Milesians (Herod. i. 17-19). It was the most telling damage that Samson could inflict on the Philistines. They had not stirred when he slew the thirty men. The living received no injury from that. But when the harvest disappears in flames, the calamity is felt far and wide. For this reason, Samson could not execute his work alone. The fire would have been more quickly perceived and more readily quenched; for he could begin only in one spot. He chose this measure, not only to show his strength and his warlike humor, but also to let the enemy see how much he was to be feared, albeit he stood alone. True it is, undoubtedly, that no other man would have found it an easy matter thus to catch and use three hundred jackals.<sup>2</sup> But what a fearful, running,<sup>3</sup> and illimitable conflagration arose, when the three hundred animals, almost crazed by the burning torches that wrapped their tails in fire, sped through the standing grain to seek deliverance and freedom for themselves and — so to speak — for Samson. The fire not only spread of itself, but was carried by the pain-maddened animals ever deeper into the possessions of the Philistines. Three hundred burning torches ran, with the swiftness of the wind, in the dry season, through the waving fields, past the shocks, and up the mountain vine-yards,<sup>1</sup> with which at all times the fox is too well acquainted for the interests of the owner. In this blow Samson, ever ingenious, translated a widely diffused popular figure into terrible reality. The word שָׂרָפָה is the general term for that class of animals of which the canis aureus, alopek, and canis vulpes are the species. It is thought that we must here think of the canis aureus, the jackal, inasmuch as this animal is found in those regions in large troops. All we can be certain of, is, that a member of the red fox family is intended, whose tail itself looks like a red burning torch or glowing coal.<sup>2</sup> For Grimm's remark (made in the year 1812, d. Museum, p. 393), that in the narrative of Reynard "the tail and its red color are indispensable," is indeed true. "The witnesses of foxes are their tails," is an old Arabic proverb (Diez, Denkwürd. v. Asien, ii. 88). The Greeks, for this reason, called the fox λαμπρὸς, bright, burning tail. Expositors have frequently directed attention to the statements of Ovid (Fast. iv. 681) concerning an ancient Roman custom, practiced in Caracoli, at the festival of the Cerealia, of letting go foxes, with burning torches tied to them, by means of which they were consumed. The idea of the ceremony was undoubtedly to present the fox, who, according to the story, once set the grain-fields on fire, as a propitiatory offering to ward off mildew,<sup>3</sup> of which he is a type. The mildew is called robigo<sup>4</sup> in Latin, Greek ῥοσθή; both to be derived from the reddish color of the affection (Preller, Röm. Myth. p. 437). This is confirmed by the fact that λαμπρὸς was also the name for the glow-worm. The Bæotians were not the only ones who, as Suidas mentions (cf. Bochart, lib. iii. xxii.), believed that fire could be kindled with the glow-worm; in Germany also tradition related that glow-worms carried coals into buildings (Wolf, Deutsche Mythologie, i. 233), just as by a similar figure the phrase, "to set the red cock on the roof" (den rothen Hahn auf's Dach setzen), was used to denote incendiarism.

of the jackals. It was finally concluded that a good pair of mittens had rendered useful service. Oedmann, Verm. Samml., ii. 32.

<sup>3</sup> The Greek name of the jackal, ῥαῖς, is derived from ῥαῖς, nimble, swift, since they run very fast, faster than wolves. Bentley holds a different opinion (Gram. ii. 276).

It was a fearful reality into which the idea of the incendiary fox was converted by Samson.<sup>5</sup> The Philistines were terrified.

Ver. 6. And the Philistines said, Who hath done this? They are informed of the author and the occasion of his wrath. They determine to avenge themselves, but choose a mode as cowardly as it was unjust. As in the former instance they left Samson's deed unpunished, so now they will have nothing to do with him. It would be impossible to show more delicately how tyrannous power becomes conciliatory and circumspect towards dependents, as soon as a man of spirit appears among them. Instead of risking anything against him, they commit an outrage on the weak in order to pacify him. They fall upon the family of the wife of Samson, and burn father and daughter in their house. It was a sad fate. It was to avert the very same danger that the woman had betrayed Samson. It was on account of the Philistines that she was separated from him. And now these execute the cruel deed in order to pacify Samson's hostility. Such is the curse of treason. But the instruments of this fate were still more guilty than its victims. For did they not know that it was against themselves that Samson had directed his national vengeance? Had he been desirous of personal vengeance on his wife's family, could he not have inflicted it himself as well as they? If they intended to punish the recreant family for having deprived Samson of his wife, they certainly could not expect thereby to inflict pain on Samson? What a difference between them and him! The injured hero turns his vengeance against the powerful; and these take satisfaction on the weak. He elevates a personal conflict into a national challenge, which they lower into vengeance on individuals. He spares the house of the Timnite, although Philistines: they murder it, from cowardly circumspection, although it is the house of a countryman. He burns their fields in order to rouse them to battle, and they burn their brethren in order to pacify the enemy.

Ver. 7. And Samson said to them, If ye act thus. This cruel cowardice awakens Samson's utmost contempt and resentment. They seek to conciliate, but only provoke. They judge the hero by themselves when they think to have quieted him by such an abomination; and he smites them according to their deserts. The loss which he had suffered was not great; but what the Philistines do, becomes to them, through his action, a source of misery. The words, "if ye act thus," express the full measure of his contempt. In ver. 3 he only spoke of "doing them evil" (damage); but now he says, I will not cease until "I have taken satisfaction on yourselves" (נָקַם). The cowardly Philistines afforded him an occasion for wrath and victory such as he had not hitherto possessed. For he must take advantage of such opportunities, on account of the torpor of his own people. He must estimate the loss of a faithless wife and a characterless Philistine father-in-law sufficiently high, in order to give free course to the national wrath against the pusillanimous foe.

Ver. 8. And he smote them, shank and thigh, with a great slaughter. What Philistines he smote is not stated; but it is to be supposed that he surprised those who burned the Timnite. These he attacked, man by man; and inflicted a "great defeat." For the words מִזְכָּה בְּדוֹלֶת are explan-

<sup>5</sup> Speaking of Hannibal's stratagem of fastening fire-brands to the horns of two thousand cattle, Livy (xii. 17) says: "Haud secus, quam silvis montibusque accessis, omnia circum virgulta ardere." — The instance of the burning fox-tails from Roman customs, is remarkably paralleled by a Persian superstition. Whenever from want of rain the grain threatened to burn up, it was the practice to fasten combustible materials to the tail of a young bullock, and set them on fire. If the bullock thus treated ran over a hill, it was regarded a favorable sign. Cf. Richardson, Abhandlungen über Sprachen etc. morgenländischer Völker, p. 226.

story of the proverbial expression שֹׁק עַל-יָרֵךְ, "shank and thigh." In the שֹׁק — the word is manifestly the same as the German Schinke, Schenkel, English, "shank" — the Hebrew saw a sensible representation of the strength of the body. "God," says the Psalmist (Ps. cxlvii. 10), "takes no pleasure in the שֹׁק of a man." When oriental narrators wish to indicate a close battle-array, they say: "shank stood on shank" (cf. Diez, Denkw. von Asien, i. 133). Both Romans and Greeks employed forms of expression which imply that to break a person's loin, hip, and shank to pieces is equivalent to hewing him down completely (cf. infringere lumbos, percutere femur, μῦθος ῥαδάσσει). The shank is underneath the thigh. The proverbial phrase is therefore equivalent to: "he smote them upper leg and lower leg," i. e. completely; and the completeness of the defeat is yet more vividly expressed in that the writer says, שֹׁק עַל-יָרֵךְ (literally, "shank upon thigh"), whereas the natural order is יָרֵךְ עַל-שֹׁק ("thigh upon shank"). He turned them upside down, and cut them to pieces. Bertheau's endeavor to explain the words by the Arabic expression, "he smote them shank-fashion," is not satisfactory, since this phrase seems rather to denote a man to man conflict. The explanation, "horseman and footman," given by the Targum, is worthy of notice, by reason of the knowledge of oriental languages which its authors may be supposed to have had. Marvelous are the explanations of many of the church fathers and elder expositors (cf. Serarius, in loc.). The LXX. translate verbally: αὐτῶν καὶ τοῦ ποδὸς; but only αὐτῶν καὶ τοῦ ποδὸς is found in Greek authors (Plato, Timæus, 74 c).

And he went down and dwelt in the cleft of the rock Etam. After such a deed he deemed himself no longer safe in Zorah and its vicinity. He looked now for a determined attack from the enemy, and sought therefore a secure place for defense and refuge. He found it in a "cleft of the rock Etam." Opinions differ widely as to the position of this locality. Bertheau finds it in an Etam near Bethlehem (the Urtas of Robinson, Bibl. Res. i. 477), which seems to be too far east, while Keil looks for it too far south, in the vicinity of Khuweilifeh. Samson cannot have intended to withdraw altogether from further conflicts, his declaration, "after that I will cease," notwithstanding; for this referred only to his recompense of the abominable deed at Timnah. Nor can he have removed to too great a distance from his home. Etam is a name which, from its significance, might naturally be of frequent occurrence, and which is very suitable for the abode of the lion-slayer and jackal-conqueror. It signifies "wild-beasts' lair;" for עֵיט is a ravenous beast. The name, which probably still answered to the reality, offered a guaranty for the sustenance of the hero who took up his dwelling there. From Deir Dubbân to Beit Jibrin (Eleutheropolis) there are found remarkable rock-caverns, which in later times became places of refuge for Christians, and which even in very ancient times doubtless served as asylums for warriors and wild beasts. Their position is such that for Samson it could not have been better (cf. Ritter, xvi. 136, etc.). In the name Deir Dubbân — dub, dob, is a bear — a reminiscence of that of Etam might still be found.<sup>1</sup>

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

[HENRY: "Visited her with a kid." The value of the present was inconsiderable, but it was intended as a token of a reconciliation. . . . It was generous in Samson, as the party offended, and the superior relation, to whom therefore she was bound to make the first motion of reconciliation. When differences happen between near relations, let those be ever reckoned the wisest and the best, that are most forward to forgive and forget injuries, and most willing to stoop and yield for peace sake. — THE SAME: "I verily thought thou hadst utterly hated her." It will never bear us out in doing ill, to say, We thought others designed ill. — THE SAME (on ver. 6): See His hand in it to whom vengeance belongs! Those that deal treacherously, shall be spoiled and dealt treacherously with, and the Lord is known by these judgments which He executes; especially when, as here, He makes use of his people's enemies as instruments for revenging his people's quarrels one upon another. — BP. HALL: If the wife of Samson had not feared the fire for herself and her father's house, she had not betrayed her husband. . . . That evil which the wicked feared, meets them in their flight. How many, in a fear of poverty, seek to gain unconscionably, and die beggars! How many, to shun pain and danger, have yielded to evil, and in the long run have been met in the teeth with that mischief which they had hoped to have left behind them! — TR.]

The Philistines threaten war against Judah. The men of Judah, to save themselves, seek to deliver up Samson, who allows himself to be bound, but tears his bonds when brought in sight of the Philistines, and slays a thousand of the enemy.

CHAPTER XV. 9-20.

9 Then the Philistines went up, and pitched in [encamped against] Judah, and 10 spread themselves in Lehi. And the men of Judah said, Why are ye come up against us? And they answered, To bind [i. e., to capture] Samson are we come up, to 11 do to him as he hath done to us. Then three thousand men of Judah went [down] to the top [cleft] of the rock Etam, and said to Samson, Knowest thou not that the Philistines are [omit: are] rulers [rule] over us? what is this that thou hast done unto us? And he said unto them, As they did unto me, so have I done unto them. And they said unto him, We are come down to bind thee, that we may deliver thee into the hand of the Philistines. And Samson said unto them, Swear unto me, that ye will not fall upon me yourselves. And they spake unto him, saying, No; but [for] we will bind thee fast [omit: fast], and deliver thee into their hand: but surely [omit: surely] we will not kill thee. And they bound him with two new cords, and brought him up from the rock. And when he came unto Lehi, the Philistines shouted against<sup>1</sup> him: and the Spirit of the Lord [Jehovah] came mightily [suddenly] upon him, and the cords that were upon his arms became as flax that was burnt with fire, and his bands loosed [melted] from off his hands. And he found a new [fresh] jaw-bone of an ass, and put forth his hand, and took it, and slew a thousand men therewith. And Samson said,<sup>2</sup>

With the jaw-bone of an ass
A mass, yea masses:
With the jaw-bone of an ass
I slew a thousand men.

And it came to pass when he had made an end of speaking, that he cast away the jaw-bone out of his hand, and [people] called that place Ramath-lehi [Hill of the jaw-bone]. And he was sore athirst, and called on the Lord [Jehovah], and said, Thou hast given this great deliverance into [by] the hand of thy servant: and now shall I die for thirst, and fall into the hand of the uncircumcised? But [And] God clave an hollow place [in the mortar] that was in the jaw [in Lehi],<sup>3</sup> and there came water thereout; and when he had drunk, [and he drank, and] his spirit came again, and he revived. Wherefore he [men] called the name thereof En-hakkore [Well of him that called], which is in Lehi unto this day. And he judged Israel in the days of the Philistines twenty years.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 14. — לְקִרְיָתָם: "towards," rather than "against." The idea is that when the Philistines saw Samson coming, they set up shouts of exultation which "met him," so to speak, as he approached. — Ta.]

[2 Ver. 16. — We place the amended rendering of this poetic utterance in the text, and for convenience' sake subjoin here that of the R. V.:—

With the jaw-bone of an ass,
Heaps upon heaps;
With the jaw of an ass
Have I slain a thousand men.

The unusual form חֲמֹר = חֹמֶר (found elsewhere, if at all, only in 1 Sam. xvi. 20), is manifestly chosen for the sake of a pun. It means a "heap;" but in order to reproduce the paronomasia as nearly as possible, we have substituted the word "mass," as suggested by Dr. Wordsworth, in loc. According to Kell, the expression, "a heap, two heaps," intimates that the victory was accomplished, not in one combat, but in several. But as the magnitude of the victory is evidently celebrated, rather than the process of its accomplishment, the dual is better regarded as designed to amplify and heighten the idea of the preceding singular: "a heap — yes, a pair of heaps!" — Ta.]

[3 Ver. 19. — פִּלְתִּי. The article occasions no difficulty, as it is frequently used with proper nouns, especially with names of places, rivers, etc.; see Ges. Gram. 109, 3, and especially Ewald, 277 c. Kell very properly observes, that if a tooth-socket in the ass's jaw-bone were intended, the expression would naturally be מִכְתֵּשׁ חֲלָחִי or מִכְתֵּשׁ פִּלְתִּי, rather than מִכְתֵּשׁ אֲשֵׁר פִּלְתִּי. Wordsworth, speaking of the opinion that God clave the rock, objects "that the words are, 'God clave the mactesh,' which seems much more applicable to the mortar of the jaw than to a place in the rock." As if an ass had but one tooth to a jaw-bone! Bush is probably not far wrong when he suggests that "a fondness for multiplying miracles," may have had some influence over the renderings of "several of the ancient versions" at this place. — Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Vers. 9, 10. And the Philistines went up and encamped against Judah. Samson had foreseen that the Philistines would now seek vengeance on a larger scale, and had therefore provided himself with a place of security against both friend and foe. This time also, however, the enemy proceed not directly against him, but take the field against Israel. As on a former occasion, they seek satisfaction from those who were really innocent, and who would gladly remain at peace. They announce that they have come to bind Samson, i. e., to make him powerless to injure them. It is no sign of forbearance that they do not say, "We will kill him;" on the contrary, it appears from ch. xvi. that they entertained still more cruel designs. It was easy for Judah to perceive how cowardly was the hatred they cherished against Samson, and thence to infer what heroic deeds of conquest the victor might yet achieve; but the great tribe, once so powerful in action, lay helpless in the deepest decay. It would not be possible to portray the slavish disposition of a people that has departed from God more strikingly, than is here done by the conduct of Judah.

Ver. 11. Then three thousand men of Judah went down to the cleft of the rock Etam. Judah never enjoyed such an opportunity to free itself from the yoke of the Philistines. It had a leader of incomparable strength and energy. The enemy had been smitten, and was apprehensive of further defeats. If it had risen now, and, ranged under Samson, undertaken a war of liberation in God's name, where was the station that the Philistines could have continued to hold? The heroic deeds of Joshua and Caleb would have been reenacted. The power of the Philistines would have been broken, perhaps forever. But what did Judah? Terrified by the threatening advance of the Philistines, coming to seek Samson, it has not even courage to say, "Go, and bind him yourselves." Three thousand armed men are quickly got together, not to avail themselves of Samson's leadership against the enemy, but—alas! for the cowards—to act as the enemy's tools, pledged to deliver the nation's hero into their hands. The Philistines, with malicious cunning, probably demanded this as the price of peace. For either Samson refuses to follow the men of Judah, and smites them, which would be gain to the Philistines, or he is taken and brought by them, in which case they will have heaped disgrace on both, and filled them with wrath toward each other. And in fact the number of the men who proceed to Etam, shows that they feel obliged, if need be, to use violence.

And they said to Samson, Knowest thou not, etc. No lost battle presents so sad a picture as do these three thousand armed men, with their complaint against Samson that he has provoked the Philistines, and their question, Knowest thou not that they rule over us? It was so easy to say to him: Up, Samson! they come to bind thee; come thou to free us from their bonds. But they cannot speak thus. Their heart is lost in idolatry. No one can raise himself to freedom, who has not first repented—for penitence is courage against self, and confession before others—and among the three thousand there are no three hundred who have not bowed to Baal. Samson's negotiation with them, although comprised in a few sentences, is worthy of admiration. After all, he had really fought only for them, and had attacked the oppressor of the nation. But he does not upbraid them with this.<sup>1</sup> Since they have not comprehended the fact that his own cause was the cause of the nation, he lays no stress on this, but shows them his personal right to engage in the war he had waged. The justification he sets up was such that they could not in honor turn against him. For he says:—

As they did unto me, so have I done unto them. Retaliation was a primitive oriental right, still sanctioned by the Koran.<sup>2</sup> To this right the Philistines had appealed in ver. 10: "We will do to Samson as he did to us." The men of Judah

1. Milton rightly makes Samson say:—

"I, on th' other side, Used no ambition to commend my deeds."

2. Sera, 5, 58, which refers to Ex. xxi. 24, where, however, the law intends to limit retaliation by determining its measure. Compare the narrative in Die, Denkwürdigkeiten Ariens, ii. 179.

3. The following translation of vers. 15–17, from a German book published in 1706, at Halle, may serve as a specimen of the exegesis which sometimes passed current:

do not undertake to decide upon the right of either party. They desire nothing but peace—with the Philistines. They would submit to them at any price. Any admission of Samson's right would have obligated them to stand by him. The fact is they came to serve not as judges but as tools of the Philistines. Whosoever is weak enough to accept such a mission, will not be brought to thought and reason by any exposition of right. Idolatry is ever blindness. Reason had vanished from the tribe. How else could it surrender such a man, or hope for peace from the Philistines after the hero whom they feared was in their possession? How can such slaves—in recent times also such conduct as theirs has been called peace-loving—expect to remain at peace?

Vers. 12, 13. We are come to bind thee, said the three thousand to the one courageous man. And never does Samson show himself greater than when he voluntarily allows himself to be bound. Against his countrymen he is powerless. With the blood of Israel he must not and will not stain himself. He makes but one condition, and that the least possible. No Judæan hands must meditate his death. That condition alone would have sufficed to inform the men of Judah, had they been able to comprehend such heroism at all, that he consults only their feelings, because they are Israelites, but does not fear the Philistines.

Ver. 14. When he came unto Lehi, the shouts of the Philistines met him. What a spectacle! That cowardice can brazen hearts and faces until all sense of shame is lost, is shown by the memorable scene here depicted. Judah is not ashamed to drag its hero forward, bound with strong cords. It does not blush when the Philistines shout aloud at the spectacle. But this cowardly jubilation was soon to be turned into groans and flight. As the hero comes in sight of the enemy and hears their outcries, the Spirit of God comes upon him. His heart boils with indignation over the ignominy of his people. His strength kindles for restless deeds. His cords fall off like tow seized by the fire. He is free, and his freedom is victory.

Vers. 15, 16. And he saw a fresh jaw-bone of an ass. The enemy is before him: therefore, forward! to battle! Any weapon is welcome. The jaw-bone of a recently fallen ass is at hand, not yet dried up, and therefore less easily broken.<sup>3</sup> Before the enemy can think, perhaps before their shouts over the prisoner have ceased, he is free, armed, and dealing out deadly blows. The panic is as great as the triumph had been. There was nothing but flight and death for the wretched foe. There ensued a slaughter and victory so extraordinary, that Samson himself, in poetic ecstasy, cries out:—

With the jaw-bone of an ass
I slew two armies:
With the jaw-bone of an ass
I took vengeance on a thousand.

בְּלִי הַחֲמוֹר הַחֲמוֹר הַחֲמוֹר הַחֲמוֹר הַחֲמוֹר the paronomasia is to be noted between חֲמוֹר, an

"Samson found a troop of lively soldiers, stretched forth his hand and commanded them, and led them against the Philistines. . . . And when he had thus spoken, he dismissed the troops." Against such insipidity protests arose at that time from all sides (cf. Starke, Not. Select., p. 137), from Gebhardt (De Maxilla Simsonis, 1707) in Greifswald, Sidelmann (De Maxilla, etc., 1708) in Copenhagen, and in a little-known, but thorough refutation by Heine, of Berlin (Dissert. Sacra, p. 245).

ass, and חֵמֶר, a heap, which latter is here poetically used of an "army."

German tradition relates a similar deed of Walter of Aquitania. His enemies pursue him in the forest, while he and Hildegunde roast and eat a swine's back. He seizes the swine's bone, and throws it against the enemy with such violence that the latter loses his eye (Wilkinasage, translated by Hagen, i. 289, ch. lxxxvii.). In the Latin poem Wallarius, the hero tears out the shoulder-blade of a calf, and with it slays the robbers (Grimm and Schmeller, Leitensche Gedichte des Mittelalters, p. 109 f.). In both versions the fiction is unreasonable and tasteless, whereas the history of Samson is full of dramatic power and spirit. — The mystical sect of the Nasairians, in Syria, are said to venerate the jaw-bone of an ass, because an ass devoured the plant on which the original documents of their religion had been written (cf. Ritter, xvii. 97, 6).

Ver. 17. The name of the place was called Ramath-lechi (Hill of the Jaw-bone). To the height upon which Samson threw the jaw-bone, the tradition of an admiring people gave and preserved a name commemorative of that circumstance. The narrative evinces artistic delicacy in that it relates that Samson uttered his poetic words while he was still victoriously swinging the unusual weapon in his hand. The humiliation of the Philistines, formerly smitten by means of foxes, and now with the jaw-bone of an ass, was too deep to allow the historical recollection of it to perish. To seek another explanation of the name is quite unnecessary. It is undoubtedly true that mountainous peaks sometimes derive names from their forms, as, for instance, "Ass'-ears" (on the coast of Aden, cf. Ritter, xii. 675), or "Tooth" (1 Sam. xiv. 4), or "Throat," "Nose," and "Horn" (cf. my Thür. Ortsnamen, ii. p. 47, n. 304); but the possibility of an historical explanation is not thereby diminished: for although peculiar names have sometimes given rise to historical legends, the above instances show that quite as often this is not the case. Lehi (properly, Lechi), as the name of a locality, does not elsewhere occur;<sup>1</sup> and a criticism which would make it the source of a history in which it has but an incidental significance, and which forms an organic part of the history of Samson as a whole, has lost all claim to be called criticism.

Ver. 18. And he was sore athirst, and called unto Jehovah. The exertion of the day was too great. The burning sun and the unusual excitement also contributed their part to exhaust the powerful man. But where was there any refreshment? He was alone, as always. The cowardly men of Judah had taken themselves off, in order not to be held responsible by the Philistines on the ground of participation in the conflict. Against the enemy he had that mediate divine help which came to him through his Nazarite consecration; but this was no protection against thirst. He turns, therefore, to God in prayer for direct deliverance.

Thou hast given this great salvation by the hand of thy servant. These words illustrate and confirm the view we have thus far sought to develop of Samson's spiritual life. In his hours of lofty elevation of soul, when the Spirit of God impels him to great deeds in behalf of national freedom, he is fully conscious of the work to which he is called. Although he stands alone, the ends he pursues are not personal. And though his people sink so deeply into cowardice and weakness, as to deny him, yet all his powers are directed against the enemies of this people. Although he himself has scarcely escaped from their hands, and has no one to stand by his side, he nevertheless considers himself their leader and champion, in duty bound to vindicate the honor and glory of Israel against the Philistines. Properly speaking, no one was delivered in the conflict on Ramath-Lehi but himself; but he thanks God for "the great salvation given by the hand of thy servant." He finds this salvation in the humiliation experienced by the Philistines, and in the fact that he, as sole representative of the true Israel, has not been allowed to be put to shame. For with his fall, the last bulwark had been leveled. The shouts of the Philistines over his bonds were shouts of triumph over the faith of Israel and over Israel's God. Hence he can pray: "Thou hast just performed a great deed through me, by which the honor of the national name of the children of Israel has been rescued and exalted, let me not now die of thirst, and in that way fall into the hands of the uncircumcised." All benefit of the victory would be lost, if Samson were now to perish. The triumph of the cowardly enemy would be greater than ever, should they next see him as a helpless corpse. He speaks of them as "the uncircumcised" for the very purpose of expressing his consciousness that with him to fight, to conquer, and to fall, are not personal matters, but involve principles. He is none other than the Nazir of God, i. e., the consecrated warrior for God and his people Israel against the enemies of the divine covenant—the uncircumcised. His petition springs from the profound emotion into which the successive experiences of this day have plunged him. The greater his ardor in battle and joy in victory, the more painful is now the thought of losing the fruits of the advantage gained, for want of a little water. Here, too, what instruction we find! "What is man that thou art mindful of him." The mighty warrior, before whom thousands tremble, cannot conquer thirst, and must perish unless a fountain opens itself.

Ver. 19. And God clave the mortar that was in Lehi. At the place where Samson was, God clave a mortar like cavity in the rock, from which water sprang, of which Samson drank, and refreshed himself. This spring was ever after named "Well of him that called;" for it was his salvation and second deliverance. The words at the close of our verse, "which (well) is in Lehi unto this day," to which those at the beginning of the verse correspond, "God clave the mortar that was in Lehi," put it beyond all doubt that the refer the term which it regularly employs to express קֵר מְאֹכֵל; but Gesenius and others before him made a mistake when they took לְחִיָּה as the proper name of a locality. It was only a general term, pagus, village, which was translated into קֵר (קֵיר).

ence is to a mortar-like well-opening in the place Lehi, and that (as Keil very well remarked) the old, frequently reproduced exposition (approved also by Bertheau), which bids us think of "the socket of a tooth in the jaw-bone," is entirely erroneous. For from ver. 17, where Samson throws the jaw-bone away, nothing more is said about it, and the name Lehi refers only to the place; just as in ver. 9 the meaning is, not that the Philistines spread themselves about a real jaw-bone, but about the place of this name. The well, it is said, "is in Lehi unto this day." The place derived its name, Ramath-lehi, from the battle of the jaw-bone; but the place was not the jaw-bone, which could not exist "unto this day." The calling forth of the well was a second deliverance, distinct from the first, which was won in battle. It occurred at Lehi, where Samson had conquered, in order that he might there also experience the vanity of all strength without God. The old opinion arose from the fact that, except in ver. 9, the ancient versions (the Sept.) everywhere translated the term Lehi, whereas it is a proper noun in ver. 19 as much as in ver. 9, as Bochart should have known precisely from the article, for it is used in all three instances, ver. 9 included. It is indeed true that later medical writers call the sockets of the double teeth δλμοι, mortars; but, granted that a similar usus loquendi prevailed in the Bible, — of which we have no other evidence than this passage can give, — the use of the article would be surprising, because elsewhere (as in Zeph. i. 11) it points (in connection with the noun מִכְתֵּשׁ) to a certain definite, mortar-like<sup>1</sup> locality. Mention might also be made of the cities in Phrygia and Cilicia that bore the name Holnos. The true view was already held by Josephus, the Chaldee Targum, and, with peculiar clearness, by R. Levi ben Gerson. Perhaps it would receive further illustration from the locality which we may probably venture to fix upon for the event. For the question where the event took place is not unimportant. It must be assumed (cf. vers. 13, 14) that Etam and Lehi were not far distant from each other. Moreover, it is evident from the connection of the entire narrative, that the Philistines must have threatened especially that part of Judah which lay contiguous to the region whence Samson made his attacks. For this reason alone, the opinion of Van de Velde (adopted by Keil), who looks for it on the road from Tell Kewelfeh to Beer-sheba, appears improbable. On the other hand, the very ancient tradition which locates the Well of Lehi in the vicinity of Eleutheropolis, appears to me, notwithstanding all opposition, to be entirely probable. It was by a series of interesting observations and arguments that Robinson, Rödiger, and others, established the fact that Eleutheropolis and the modern Beit Jibrin, the Betogabra of the Tabula Peutingeriana, are the same place (cf. Ritter, xvi. 139); but the hints of the Midrash might have led to the same conclusion, and even now afford additional instruction. To the peculiarities of the region belong the numerous cave-formations, which, by their more or less perfect artificial finish, prove themselves to have been the abodes of men in ancient times. חֹר (chor) is a cavern, and the term חֹרִי (Chorite, E. V. Horite) signifies troglodytes, people who dwell in caverns. Now, wherever the Chorite is spoken of, the Midrash explains by substituting Eleutheropolis.<sup>2</sup> It has not hitherto been discovered what circumstance induced the Romans to give this beautiful name to the place. But since the tradition of an heroic exploit (תְּשׁוּעָה בְּדוֹלָה) was connected with the place, the Jewish inhabitants derived the name חֹרִי or פֶּית חֹרִי, which it may have borne, not from חֹר, a cavern, but from חֹר, a freeman. "Bene Chorin," is the title assumed by those whom heroic feats have made free.<sup>3</sup> The same idea leads the Midrash when it derives Eleutheropolis from chiruth, freedom. The name Eleutheropolis was, in fact, only a translation of the ancient name, whose meaning the inhabitants had changed from "City of the Troglodyte" to "City of the Free," and is undeniably found in the Mishna and Talmud under the forms בית חורין and בית חורין.<sup>4</sup> If the inhabitants expound the present name Beit Jibrin as meaning "House of Gabriel," every one capable of forming a judgment in the case perceives at once that this became possible only with the prevalence of Islam in those regions. But as the name itself is older than Islam, and is apparently found in the Midrash (as גִּבְרִין, Beth Goberin), the conjecture suggests itself that it is related to גִּבְרָה, hero, גִּבְרִיָּה, heroism; which, if true, connects it once more with Samson's achievement. The "House of Heroism" answers entirely to the "House of Freedom." And it is at least not impossible that a change of etymological derivation, like that in the case of Chorite, occurred here also, namely, from נֶכֶח, a hole, to גִּבְרָה, a hero. The expression בֵּית הַחֹר, in the sense of jaw-bone, occurs also.

The change of the "Troglodytes' City" into the "City of Heroes," demonstrates the existence of an old tradition, which, so far as the names (Freedom, Heroism) can explain anything, spoke of the hero who there became free. Springs are still found near the city. One in particular, near the Church of St. Anne, flows from the hard rock, is "fifty-two feet deep, and apparently ancient" (Rob. ii. 26). It is to be noted that Josephus makes Samson's fountain to spring out of a rock, and declares that its name was still known in his day. The Targum likewise says that God did split the rock (פָּצַח), and translates: "They called it 'the well that arose at the prayer of Samson,' and it exists in Lehi unto this day."

No other well than this [one near the church of St. Anne], can be intended by Jerome, when on passing Socoh, he visits the Fountain of Samson (Ep. ad Eust., 106, ed. Benedict. 86). The tradition continued steadfast until the time of Antoninus Martyr, who says (circa 600 A. D.): "We

<sup>3</sup> Cf. Buxtorff, Lex., p. 886. Israel calls itself by this name in the beautiful hymn Pesach haagadiah, with reference to the time when Meedah shall have made it free. It is true, at least, that He alone makes free.

came into the city called Eliotropolis, where Samson, that most valiant man, slew a thousand men with a jaw-bone, out of which jaw-bone, at his prayer, water sprang forth, which fountain irrigates that place unto this day: and we were at the place where it rises." Traditions reaching so far beyond the age of Islam, are always worthy of attention, especially when they suit so well in their localities. For the distance from Eleutheropolis combines very well with the theatre of Samson's exploits hitherto, and confirms our assumption that Etam lay in the neighborhood of the present Deir Dubban. When the Jews grounded the name "City of Freedom" on this tradition, they followed considerations not only beautiful, but also both ethically and historically correct.

It is unquestionably a remarkable feature in the narrative of the occurrence, that, while Samson prays to "Jehovah," the answer is ascribed to "Elohim:" "Elohim clave the mortar." Keil's explanation, that it is thereby intimated that God worked the miracle as Lord of nature, does not seem sufficient. For is not "Jehovah" the Creator of Nature? The Targum uses that name here. According to our view of the relations of the names Jehovah and Elohim in our Book, the latter appears not only when heathen gods are spoken of, but also when others than believing Israelites speak of God. Elohim is here used in order to intimate that non-Israelites also ascribed the wonderful fountain in Lehi to divine intervention. Not only Israel tells of it, how Jehovah clave it, but all admit that it is a work of Elohim.

Ver. 20. And Samson judged Israel, in the days of the Philistines, twenty years. In the introduction to the history of Samson (ch. xiii. 1), it is stated that the Philistines lorded it over Israel forty years. In ch. xiii. 5 it is said: "he shall begin to deliver Israel." Their entire downfall he did not accomplish. The blame of this rested not only with the people, of whom ch. xiii. does not say that they had repented, but, as ch. xvi. shows, also with Samson. But the twenty years during which he wrought are not filled out by the occurrences related. These only indicate what feats and dangers were necessary to qualify Samson for government in Israel. And it may well be supposed that after this the Philistines scarcely undertook to confront him. Doubtless, the tribe of Judah also, must after this last exploit have acknowledged his divine strength, and yielded him their confidence. He himself, in thirst and faintness, had learned that God alone gives strength and help; and this may have served for the moral elevation of the people also. Israel dwelt in security and peace for twenty years, through the consecration and deeds of Samson. For this reason he stood among them as Judge. It was only the want of courage on Israel's part — due to its imperfect faith — and the excess of it on Samson's part, that plunged both alike into new distress and suffering.

[BP. HALL: The Philistines that had before ploughed with Samson's heifer, in the case of the riddle, are now ploughing a worse furrow with a heifer more his own. I am ashamed to hear these cowardly Jews say, Knowest thou not, etc. — SCOTT: Heartless professors of religion, who value the friendship and fear the frown of the world, and who are the slaves of sin and Satan, censure, hate, and betray those who call them to liberty in the service of God. To save themselves, in times of persecution, they often apostatize and turn betrayers and accusers of the brethren. — BP. HALL: Now these Jews, that might have let themselves loose from their own bondage, are binding their deliverer. — HENRY: Thus the Jews delivered up our Saviour, under pretense of a fear lest the Romans should come, and take away their place and nation. — WORDSWORTH: This conduct of the men of Judah, saying that the Philistines are their rulers, and delivering Samson to them, may be compared to that of the Jews, saying, "We have no king but Cæsar" (John xix. 15), and delivering up Christ to the Romans.

WORDSWORTH (on Samson's victory): A greater miracle was wrought "in the time of wheat-harvest" (cf. ver. 1), namely, at the first [Christian] Pentecost, when three thousand were converted by the preaching of Peter and of the other Apostles, filled with the Spirit of God. — BP. HALL: This victory was not in the weapon, was not in the arm; it was in the Spirit of God, which moved the weapon in the arm. O God! if the means be weak, Thou art strong!

HENRY (on Samson's prayer): Past experiences of God's power and goodness, are excellent pleas in prayer for further mercy. "Lest the uncircumcised triumph, and so it redound to God's dishonor." The best pleas are those taken from God's glory. — KITTO: Not many would have had such strong persuasion of the Lord's providential care as would lead them to cry to Him for water to supply their personal wants in the like exigency.

HENRY (on En-hakkore): Many a spring of comfort God opens to his people which may fitly be called by this name: it is the "well of him that cried." — TR.]

[1 Ver. 1. — יָבֵיחַ אֶלְיָי. Dr. Cassel, in accordance with his exposition (see below), renders, and kam zu ihr, "and came (went) to her." This rendering is certainly possible (cf. Gen. vi. 20; Ps. li. 1, etc.); but as the expression is a standing euphemism, the writer of Judges would scarcely have employed it in its more proper sense here, where the context would inevitably suggest the least favorable interpretation. — Ta.]

[2 Ver. 2. — יָבֵיחַ (cf. Gen. xxii. 20) and יָבֵיחַ, has doubtless been dropped out of the text by some oversight of transcribers. The Sept., Targum, and other ancient versions, supply the deficiency, if indeed it existed in their day. — Ta.]

[3 Ver. 2. — יָבֵיחַ: the accusative (cf. Eccles. ix. 14) object of this verb is to be disengaged from לוֹ, the object of the immediately following verb. So Bertheau and Keil. Dr. Cassel takes the word in the sense "to go about," to patrol, which would require the object עֵיר (Isa. xlii. 16) or עֵירָא (Cant. iii. 8) to be expressed. — Ta.]

[4 Ver. 2. — עַד־אֶחָד הַבֹּקֶר: literally, "Until morning light! then we kill him." That is, "Wait (or, with reference to the preceding יִשְׁכַּחֲשֶׁה: Be quiet) until morning light," etc. Cf. 1 Sam. i. 22. אֶחָד is the infinitive construct, cf. Ges. Lex. a. v. עָצַב, B, 2, b. — Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Ver. 1. And Samson went to 'Azzah. The heroic deeds of Samson have driven the Philistines back within their old boundary-lines. They no longer venture to come anywhere near him. He, however, with the fearlessness of genius, undertakes to visit them in their own fortified chief city. 'Azzah, the Gaza of the Greeks, was the most powerful border-city and capital of the Philistines. There, as in Gath and Ashdod, remnants of the Anakim are said to have remained (Josh. xi. 22).

Concerning the etymology of the name אֶזְזָה ('Azzah), different opinions have been expressed.

Hitzig's derivation from עֵז, "she-goat," has been justly called in question by Stark (Gaza und die philist. Küste, p. 46). But by the side of the view which, after the older authorities (from Jerome down) he adopts — which makes אֶזְזָה to be "the strong, fortified city," in contrast with the open country, and appeals to such names as Rome and Valentia as analogous — I would place another, perhaps more accordant with the national spirit of the Philistines. The origin of the name must probably be sought in the worship of Mars-Typhon, the warlike Death-god. Movers has compared 'Azzah, the Troezenian name of Persephone, with אֶזְזָה (Phönizier, i. 367). "Strong," in the true sense of the word, may be appropriately predicated of death; accordingly it is said in the "Song of Solomon" (ch. viii. 6): "Strong (אֶזְזָה) as death is love." To the name 'Azzah (Azesia) not only el-Asa, the idol of the ancient Arabians (Mars-Asiz) would correspond, but also and especially אֶזְזָה (Azazel), to whom the Mosaic law sent the goat laden with the sins of the people. The name 'Azzah had its origin in the service of subterranean, typhonic deities, peculiar to the coasts of the Mediterranean sea. Although the Greeks called the city Gaza, it is nevertheless clear that the Indo-Germanic etymology of this word (γᾶς), which signifies "public treasure," is not to be brought into comparison.

Samson comes not, alas! like the tribe of Judah

(ch. i. 18), to conquer the city. But it is a question whether the sensuality which at other times lulled his heroism to sleep, was also the occasion of his present visit to Gaza. The cultus of the Canaanitish nations, and the beauty of the Philistine women, were favorable to voluptuousness.

Ancient expositors explained אֶזְזָה to mean a female inn-keeper, a hostess. They were so far right, that the houses of harlots were those that stood open to all comers, including such strangers as had no relations of acquaintance and mutual hospitality with any one in the city. (Compare, in Latin, the transition into each other of caupona and leno, caupona and lena.) Hence, the Targum has everywhere (including Judg. xi. 1) translated אֶזְזָה by אֶזְזָהָא, i. e., "female innkeeper," zawōneia. On this account, the spies, also, whom Joshua sent out, and who were influenced by no sensual impulses, could quarter themselves nowhere in Jericho but in the house of a zonah (Josh. ii. 1). Samson did not come to Gaza for the purpose of visiting a harlot: for it is said that "he went thither, and saw there a zonah." But when he wished to remain there over night, there was nothing for him, the national enemy, but to abide with the zonah. This time the narrative gives no occasion to tax him with sensuality. We do not read, as in ver. 4, "and he loved her." His stay is spoken of in language not different from that employed with reference to the abode of the spies in the house of Rahab. The words, "he saw her," only indicate that when he saw a woman of her class, he knew where he could find shelter for the night. The purpose of his coming was to give the Philistines a new proof of his fearlessness, which was such that he did not shun to meet them in their own chief city.

Ver. 2. And when the 'Azzites were told, that Samson was come thither. He had been seen. It was probably towards evening when he entered the city. The houses in which the trade of a zonah was carried on, lay anciently and still lie on the walls of the city (Josh. ii. 15), not far from the gates. Although it is not stated whether the inhabitants knew where he was, it must be assumed that they did; for, being in the city, he had no choice as to his place of abode. The king of Jericho commands Rahab to deliver up the spies; but the description here given of the way in which the 'Azzites set to work to catch the dreaded foe, is highly amusing and characteristic. The most direct way would have been to have attacked him in the house of the zonah; but that course they avoid. They propose to lie in wait for him when he comes out. Our author's use of the imperfects וַיִּשְׁכְּבוּ and וַיַּחֲבִירוּ is peculiar and interesting. That of which they speak, and say it must be done, as: "patrols must go about," and "bands must lie in wait all night at the gate," the graphic narrator relates as if it were actually done. They did nothing of the kind, however, but instead of patrolling and watching "all night," they were afraid, and kept quiet "all night" (קָלִי-הַלַּיְלָה), used twice in order to hint at the contrast between counsel and action which they exhibited). They should doubtless have been on their legs throughout the night, but in fact they וַיִּשְׁכְּבוּ kept themselves still, made no noise, and heard nothing, just as a timid householder, who is afraid of the burglar, feigns to be fast asleep, so as not to be obliged to hear the robbery going on. The gate, they say to each other, is firmly fastened, so that he cannot get out of the city, and to-morrow, at sunrise, we have certainly killed him (the narrator again represents the thing talked about as done, וַיִּהְיֶה). "Ah yes, to-morrow!" To-morrow, to-morrow, only not to-day, is the language of all lazy people—and of the timorous as well.<sup>1</sup>

Ver. 3. But Samson slept till midnight. He had been told that his presence in Gaza was known. How little fear he felt, appears from the fact that he slept till midnight. Then he arose, went calmly to the gate, and (as it was closed and barred) lifted out its posts, placed the doors on his shoulders, and tranquilly proceeded on his way home. Humor and strength characterized all his deeds. On this occasion, however, the mighty jest which he played off on the inhabitants of Gaza, was also the worst humiliation which he could inflict upon them. The gates of a place symbolized its civic and national strength, inasmuch as they represented ingress into it. Samson enacted literally, as it were, the promise made to Abraham: "Thy seed shall possess the gate of its enemies" (Gen. xxii. 17). The fact that Rebecca is dismissed with the same blessing (Gen. xxiv. 60): "May thy seed possess the gate of those who hate it!" indicates the popular diffusion of the idea that to take possession of an enemy's gate is to obtain a complete victory over him. Hence, in the East victorious princes have frequently literally carried away the gates of conquered cities (cf. Hammer, Gesch. des Osman. Reichs, i. 267). For the same reason, Almansor, when he took Compostella, caused the doors of the St. James' Church to be lifted out, and to be carried on the shoulders of Christians, to Cordova, in sign of his victory (Ferreras, Gesch. von Spanien, iii. 145). The same idea presents itself in North-German legends, when giants are represented as carrying away churches from their places, in order to show their hostility against Christianity (Schambach and Müller, Nieders. Sagen, pp. 150, 151).

But precisely because the removal of the gate of Gaza was expressive of the national humiliation of the Philistines before Israel — Israel having, as it were, in the person of its representative, taken their chief city by storm — it is necessary to take the statement that Samson carried the gate "up to the top of the mountain before (עַל-רֹאשׁ) Hebron," in a more literal sense than Keil feels himself bound to do. Hebron was the centre and chief seat of the tribe of Judah. It was probably the abode of Samson also during the twenty years of his judgeship. Israel's triumph and the Philistines' ignominy were both most plainly expressed when the gate of Gaza was lying before Hebron; for it was found appropriate to carry the gates of the chief city of the enemy to the chief city of the conqueror, otherwise Hebron would not have been mentioned at all. As to the difficulty of carrying the gate so far as Hebron, it is unnecessary to waste a word upon it. He who wrenched the gate from its firm security, could also carry it to Hebron. Besides, as soon as he was in Judea, he had time enough. In Hebron the evidences of the great hero's triumph and the Philistines' humiliation were probably exhibited long after the event took place. Even when nations seem least capable of doing great things, it is yet a cheering sign, promissory of better days, if they take pleasure in the great deeds of former times. Israel was in servitude for the very reason that it no longer knew the greatness of its ancestors (ch. ii. 10). Whoever takes pleasure in Samson, affords some ground to hope for freedom.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

The ancient church used the gate of Gaza, as a type of the gates of hell destroyed by Christ. A modern art-critic, it is true, has remarked that most of the pictures which were supposed to be representations of Samson, carrying away the gates of Gaza, are not such, but represent the paralytic of the gospels, who took up his bed and walked (Martigny, Dictionnaire, p. 599). But the essential matter is, not the pictures, but the spirit. Gaza is, as it were, the stronghold of the enemy. Samson, who enters it, resembles Christ, who is laid in the grave. But the enemy cannot bind the living Word. He not only rises from the dead, but He deprives the fortress of its gates, so that it can no longer detain any who would be free. Only he remains a captive, in whom sin reigns, and passion is supreme — who would be free from Christ.

<sup>1</sup> [The above explanation of ver. 2 is more ingenious than satisfactory. The text does not speak of what the Philistines said ought to be done, but of what was done. It is true, that this view meets with the difficulty of explaining how Samson could carry off the gate, and the watchers be apparently none the wiser. The answer is probably that after the guards and lie-in-wait were posted, these rendered sleepy by inaction (וַיִּשְׁכְּבוּ), and confident that Samson would not leave the zonah until morning, became "quiet" in a sense beyond that intended by the instructions they had received — in other words, allowed themselves to fall asleep. Cf. Bertheau and Keil. — Tr.]

CHAPTER XVI. 4-20.

4 And it came to pass afterward [after this], that he loved a woman in the valley of 5 Sorek, whose name was Delilah. And the lords [princes] of the Philistines came up unto her, and said unto her, Entice [Persuade] him, and see wherein his great strength lieth, and by what means we may prevail against him, that we may bind him to afflict [lit. humble, i. e., subdue] him: and we will give thee every one of us eleven hun-6 dred pieces of silver. And Delilah said to Samson, Tell me, I pray thee, wherein thy great strength lieth, and wherewith thou mightest be bound to afflict [subdue] 7 thee. And Samson said unto her, If they bind me with seven green withs [moist cords],<sup>1</sup> that were never [have not been] dried, then shall I be weak, and be as an-8 other [any other] man. Then the lords [princes] of the Philistines brought up to her seven green withs [moist cords], which had not been dried, and she bound him
9 with them. (Now there were men lying in wait, abiding with her in the chamber.)<sup>2</sup>
And she said unto him, The Philistines be upon thee, Samson. And he brake the withs [cords] as a thread of tow is broken when it toucheth [smelleth] the fire. So 10 his strength was not known. And Delilah said unto Samson, Behold, thou hast mocked [deceived] me, and told me lies: now tell me, I pray thee, wherewith thou 11 mightest be bound. And he said unto her, If they bind me fast [omit: fast] with new ropes that never were occupied [with which no work was ever done], then shall 12 I be weak, and be as another [any other] man. Delilah therefore took new ropes, and bound him therewith, and said unto him, The Philistines be upon thee, Samson. (And there were liars in wait abiding in the chamber.)<sup>3</sup> And he brake them 13 from off his arms like a thread. And Delilah said unto Samson, Hitherto thou hast mocked [deceived] me, and told me lies: tell me wherewith thou mightest be bound.
14 And he said unto her, If thou weavest the seven locks of my head with [i. e., into] the web [i. e., the warp]. And [she did so, and] she fastened it with the pin, and said unto him, The Philistines be upon thee, Samson. And he awaked out of his sleep, 15 and went away with [pulled out] the pin of the beam [loom], and with [omit: with] the web [or, warp]. And she said unto him, How canst thou say, I love thee, when thine heart is not with me? Thou hast mocked [deceived] me these three times, and 16 hast not told me wherein thy great strength lieth. And it came to pass when she pressed him daily with her words, and urged him, so that his soul was vexed unto 17 death; That he told her all his heart, and said unto her, There hath not come a razor upon mine head; for I have been [am] a Nazarite unto God from my mother's womb: if I be shaven, then my strength will go from me, and I shall become weak, 18 and be like any [all] other man [men]. And when [omit: when] Delilah saw that he had told her all his heart, [and] she sent and called for the lords [princes] of the Philistines, saying, Come up this once, for he hath shewed me<sup>4</sup> all his heart.
Then the lords [princes] of the Philistines came up unto her, and brought [the] 19 money in their hand. And she made him sleep upon her knees; and she called for a man, and she caused him to shave [and she shaved]<sup>4</sup> off the seven locks of his 20 head; and she began to afflict [subdue] him, and his strength went from him. And she said, The Philistines be upon thee, Samson. And he awoke out of his sleep, and said, I will go out as at other times before, and shake myself [free].<sup>5</sup> And he wist not that the Lord [Jehovah] was departed from him.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 7. — יִתְּרִים לַחִים: literally, "moist cords or strings." KEN: "יִתְּרִי means string, e. g., of a bow, Ps. xi. 2; and in Arabic and Syriac both bow-string and guitar-string. Now since the יִתְּרִים are here distinguished from the עֲבָתִים, ropes (ver. 11), the former must be understood of animal tendons or gut-strings." It is certainly in favor of this view that the יִתְּרִים are to be "moist," as also that it makes a strong and climactic distinction between יִתְּרִים and עֲבָתִים. Compare the rendering of the LXX: νευραὶς ὑγραῖς. — TA.]

[3 Ver. 9. — וְהַלֹּקֵט יָשָׁב לָהּ בַּחֲדָרָה: "and the lurker sat for her in the apartment." In itself considered, הַלֹּקֵט might be collective, as rendered by the E. V. (cf. ch. xx. 88); but, although other Philistines may have been near at hand, it would be difficult to conceal the presence in the room itself of more than one, and hence it would hardly be attempted. לָהּ is dat. commodi. The rendering, "with her," adopted also by Cassel (and De Wette), is not indeed impossible, but gives to לָהּ a meaning which it rarely has, and which is here less suitable. — Ta.]

3 Ver. 18. — The reading לִי of the keri is evidently the correct one, notwithstanding Kell's remarks in favor of לָהּ. [Kell would make the clause a remark inserted by the narrator: "for he had showed her (לָהּ) all his heart." — Ta.]

[4 Ver. 19. — וְהִגְלִיחַ: "and she shaved." The piel is not causative here; compare the pual in ver. 17. The E. V. seems to accept the interpretation of the Vulgate and Alex. Sept., which translate לִגְלִיחַ by "barber." "The man" (לִגְלִיחַ = לִגְלִיחַ) is probably the Philistine who was on duty at the time as "lurker;" and Delilah calls on him, in order to have somebody near to defend her should Samson wake during the shearing process. Cf. Kell. — Ta.]

[5 Ver. 20. — וְאָמַרְתִּי: Dr. Cassel translates, will mich ermannen, "put on and assert my manhood." He supposes Samson to see the Philistines, and to express his determination to give them battle as heretofore (see below). But not to say that וְאָמַרְתִּי will not bear this sense, it seems clear that the "other times" refer to the previous attempts of Delilah to master his secret. — Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Ver. 4. And it came to pass that he loved a woman in the valley of Sorek, whose name was Delilah. Let him who stands, take heed lest he fall. This is valid also for the powerful personality of Samson. It is true that the adventures, in which sensuality ensnared him, had hitherto been only occasions for acting as the hero of his people. But it is true also that his present love differs in many respects from that which he gave to the woman of Timnah. Then he was young, and for his people's sake needed natural occasions for war against the Philistines—to say nothing of the fact that at that time he sought lawful matrimony. Now, he has long been a man. His strength and greatness need no more demonstration. Delilah was not his wife: if not a "zonah," she was still but a weaver-woman, whom he saw and loved. Moral dangers, like all dangers, may, in the providence of God, serve to give experience to a man, and afford him opportunities for victory; but to run into them, in the confidence of winning new victories, is not permitted, even to a Samson. The "Nazir of Elohim" is not to be measured by common rules: everything is lawful for him; but only so long as he does not desecrate by means of itself the strength with which he is endowed.

By giving the name of the place where, and of the woman whom, Samson loved, the narrator already foreshadows the temptation into which he placed himself. The Nachal (Valley of) Sorek is evidently named after a variety of the grape—in appearance almost stoneless, yet provided with a soft stone, and productive of a precious red wine (cf. Jer. ii. 21; Isa. v. 2)—which elsewhere gives the name Kischmi to an Arabian island (Ritter, xii. 452). Of the position of the Nachal Sorek we have no other tradition than that of Eusebius, who knew a place named Sorech (al. l. Barech), north of Eleutheropolis, in the vicinity of Zorah, the home of Samson. But this tradition can scarcely be accepted. For the place, judging from the connection of the narrative, cannot have been remote from Gaza (cf. ver. 21). Nay, even the immediate connection of our narrative with the previous occurrence in Gaza, points to the vicinity of the latter city. Moreover, it is to be supposed that precisely in the region indicated by Eusebius, all Philistine supremacy was abrogated by the growing fear of Samson's activity as Judge. Nor is it difficult to see that the tradition followed by Eusebius, connects itself with the exegesis of ch. xiii. 25. It will therefore be an allowable conjecture, to assume as the theatre of the sad catastrophe which is now related, the present wretched village Simsim, whence the Wady (Nachal) Simsim, passed by the traveller on the way from Gaza to Ashkelon, where it debouches, derives its name (Ritter, xvi. 68). It is remarkable that another, albeit in this respect erroneous tradition, led astray by the name Askulân, Ashkelon, has identified this wady with the brook Eshcol, which must indeed be sought near Hebron, but which likewise derived its name from the grapes of that region.

The name of the woman would not have been given by the narrator, had he not wished to intimate the same idea which R. Mair expressed (Sota, 9, 2; Talkut, n. 70),<sup>1</sup> when he remarked, that even if Delilah had not been her name, she might nevertheless properly be so called, because דִּילְיָלָה

דִּילְיָלָה, "she debilitated his strength." The form דִּילְיָלָה (from Chaldee דלל) has clearly also given rise to the name Δαλιδά, which is given to Delilah in the Septuagint and in many MSS. of Josephus, and which is therefore probably not a false rendering. We meet also with a Greek female name Δαλís, Δαλίδος. The name Delilah reminds us readily of the onomatopoeic German word ein-tullen [English, to lull asleep], Greek βαυκαλᾶν (whence a proper name Βαύκαλος). Sensuality sings and lulls the manly strength of the hero to sleep. The voluptuous chiefs<sup>2</sup> of the Philistines know this full well, and therefore they say:

Ver. 5. Persuade him, and see wherein his great strength lieth. Samson was no giant, coarse and elephantine, like a Cyclops; otherwise, they would have been at no loss to explain his strength. The shoulders on which he bore the gate-doors of Gaza were not sixty ells apart, as in the figurative expression of the Talmud. He was regularly built, although we may conceive of him

But on this very account, because physically he did seem very different from themselves, and as they knew not the power of divine inspiration, they entertained the wide-spread superstition, still current in the East, that he had some occult means at his service, from which he derived his unusual strength. The expressions for amulets and charms for such and similar purposes, are still very numerous in the Persian and Arabic idioms. Rustem, according to the Iranian legend, could not have overcome Isfendiar, if he had not previously learned the charm which gave the latter his strength. Scandinavian mythology, also, puts Thor in possession of his highest strength, only when he puts on the girdle which assures it to him. Even in Germany, the superstition was prevalent until comparatively recent times, that persons had sometimes become "fearfully strong;" through the use of demoniac flesh (Meier, Schwüb. Sagen, p. 111). In the year 1718 a person confessed that the devil had given him a receipt, in the possession of which he felt himself stronger than all other men (cf. Tharsander, Schauplatz unger. Meinungen, ii. 514 f.).

It was all important for the Philistines to learn Samson's charm, in order to render it powerless. They hear of his love for Delilah. They were aware that before this the hero had failed to withstand the cajoleries of the woman he loved. In both earlier and later times, the orientals were conversant with the dangers which often arise to even the greatest heroes and kings, from their weakness toward women. Tradition and poetry are full of it. In the apocryphal Esdras (I. ch. iv. 26 f.) we read: "Many have gone out of their wits for women, and have become slaves on account of them. Many have perished, and erred, and sinned, by reason of women." And the Turkish poet Hamdi says: "Brother, if thou comest to women, do not trust them. Women have deceived even prophets." Though this be true, all women are not thereby defamed. Traitors like Delilah are only those who are such as she was, just as the only lovers of treason are cowardly men, like the Philistines, who dare not meet greatness openly.

And we will give thee eleven hundred pieces of silver each. It is a very mean trade that is here driven with the affections of Samson. It is an instance so deterrent, that it might well move deeply and instruct both young and old. The woman of Timnah betrayed Samson either from fear or from Philistine zeal: this one sells him for money; and the Philistines with whom she trades are very careful in making their promises. It is not enough, they stipulate, that she ascertains the secret; it must be such that use can be made of it, and that with the particular specified result. This carefulness shows that the cold-blooded Philistines knew with whom they had to do. So much the sadder is it to see Samson lavish caresses on such a woman. The sum for which Delilah consents to sell the hero is not insignificant. Since each of the princes promises 1,100 shekels of silver, and since, according to Judg. iii. 3, the number of princes may be set down as five, the sum pledged amounted to 5,500 shekels, between 4,500 and 5,000 [Prussian] Reichsthaler [i. e., between 3,000 and 3,500 dollars].<sup>1</sup>—Had Curius, the Roman, been less niggardly towards Fulvia, his scortum, the Catilinian conspiracy might perhaps have been more successful (Sallust, Catilina, 23).

Vers. 6-9. If they bind me with seven fresh cords. Delilah accepts the offers held out by treason, and begins to insinuate herself into Samson's favor<sup>2</sup> by inquiries about his strength. But Samson does not tell her the truth. Why not? Because from that moment he would have been obliged to have nothing more to do with her. For her questions reminded him of the divine origin of his strength, which was not given for such a house, and which after a true answer could no longer be secure there. As soon as he told the truth, he must either depart or perish, separate from his charmer or suffer. The mediæval poetry in which heroes of superior origin live peaceably with women, but are obliged to separate from them as soon as these begin to inquire after their descent, represents the same thought in poetical garb. The wife's questions, however, in these fictions, are not put with treasonable intent. They nevertheless drive the man away (cf. my work: Der Schwan, p. 21, etc.).

Want of confidence and national fellowship<sup>3</sup> do not permit Samson to give the true answer to Delilah. But if these be wanting, how can he consort with her, even leaving her questions out of view? That this is not impossible, is but too plain; but the explanation of it is unpleasing. Samson, in his sensual sports, lays no claims to morality, and the heroism, in which he feels himself secure, sleeps under the pleasing sensations of the play. He would continue to divert himself, and therefore prefers not to tell the truth. In the "seven cords," however, he already hints at the "seven locks" of his head. Here is the germ of his fall. He seeks to quiet Delilah by some sort of answer. Seven cords of animal tendons, not yet stretched (cf. Saalschütz, Archäologie, i. 141, note 8), are undoubtedly sufficient to render a strong man incapable of defending himself. It was an answer which Delilah might reasonably believe, while for himself it contained no danger; for who will put the cords on him, except by his own permission? Even when at a subsequent visit Delilah had the cords in readiness, and coaxed him to allow her to bind him with them, he could still consent to be passive. Had the Philistines actually attacked him, it would but have afforded him a desirable opportunity for an heroic feat. But the Philistines are careful, and keep at a distance until they see how the trial will end. When Delilah raises the cry of Philistines, Samson rends the cords asunder as so many threads of tow. He gave a proof of his strength, but gained no victory.

however, who regards her as "a light, venal woman of Samson's own tribe," makes a suggestion worthy of consideration on the other side. "Hence," he says (namely, she being an Israelitess), "she professed love for Samson, when she said, 'The Philistines' (mine enemies as well as thine) 'are upon thee, Samson.' He was the more easily caught in the snare because he could not imagine that a woman of Israel would betray him."—Ta.]

<sup>3</sup> [Dr. Cassel assumes all through the present discussion that Delilah was a Philistine woman. He is probably correct, cf. Smith's Bible Dict., art. "Delilah." Wordsworth,

That which the principle of evil here attempts against the hero, Scandinavian mythology, in the Edda, represents inversely. The "Ases" (demigods) are afraid of the "Wolf" (the representative of evil). They persuade him to allow himself to be bound, in order to show his strength. He tears asunder one chain after another, until he is bound by means of a singular cord, whose symbolical sense makes it the same as that under which Samson succumbs: for it is the cord of sensuality. — It is a distorted form of our narrative which we find in the Slavic story of the strong son, who rends the rope in pieces, but succumbs under the thin string, which cuts into his flesh.

Vers. 10-12. If they bind me with new ropes with which no work was ever done. Samson's contempt of the Philistines is so great, that he does not even become angry with Delilah, whose behavior nevertheless could not but appear suspicious to him. And she knows her power over him so well, that, after the ancient manner of women, she seeks to escape the reproaches which he might be expected to make against her, by anticipating them with her own against him. And that with all the brazen effrontery characteristic of women whose charms are great and whose hearts are bad. "I saw Apame," it is said in the apocryphal Esdras (I. ch. iv. 29 ff.), "taking the crown from the king's head, and striking him. If she laughs upon him, he laughs; if she is angry at him, he flatters her, that she may be reconciled to him." Delilah, with treason in her heart, dares to tax Samson with falsehood. But she uses this feigned sensitiveness and her crocodile tears to renew her attempts to gain his secret and her reward. Still he does not tell her the truth; but yet she makes an advance towards her end. It could not be otherwise. For although Samson's greatness only jests, it is nevertheless true that his godlike strength was not given for sport. The playfully received reproach that he had told her lies, drives him involuntarily a step nearer the truth which her demand profanes. Satan already draws his snares one stitch closer. For when he tells her that he can be bound by new cords "with which no work has been done," the added qualification is not an empty and meaningless one. He was already once bound with "new cords" (ch. xv. 13), and set himself free. But the cords "with which no work has yet been done," are an image of his strength; the hair of his head also is unprofaned — no razor has ever touched it. Strength and consecration were characteristic of the things yet uncontaminated by the uses and defilements of life. The vehicle, on which the ark of God is transported must be drawn by animals never before yoked, and must itself be new. The Philistine diviners (1 Sam. vi. 7) know this; the law of Israel also recognizes the principle, in its requirement that the red heifer of purification shall be one upon whom yoke never came<sup>1</sup> (Num. xix. 2). Availing himself of this belief, Samson speaks of "new cords, which have never done service," in order by this suggestion of special strength in them, to make his answer more credible, while it at the same time gives a reflection of the truth with regard to himself.

But the treason does not yet succeed. The Philistine spy, who is present but concealed (פְּחִינִי, in the inner apartment), must for the second time depart, disappointed and gloomy. The cords fall from his arms like threads. It was for him but a pleasant pastime thus to give Delilah one more proof of his strength, hoping perhaps to deter her from further questioning. If he did believe this, it could only be in consequence of his magnificent confidence, which in the consciousness of strength verged toward weakness. But natures like Delilah's do not relax: avarice and vexation urge them on. In the Old-French romance of Merlin, that wise man says that such women are, "hameçons a prendre poissons en rivière, reths a prendre les oiseaux a la pipée, rasouers tranchans et afflez."

Vers. 13, 14. If thou weavest the seven locks of my head into the web. He still conceals the truth; but also once more yields a step. The untruth constantly diminishes, the danger constantly increases. He thinks no longer of actual ropes; he speaks already of the locks of his head. Formerly, he hinted at them, under the figure of that which is untouched of labor, but named cords; now he names his hair, but does not yet speak of its untouched consecration. So organically does his own noble nature press him onward into the snares set for him by the reproaches and tears of the traitress. As soon as he determined either to tell the truth, or not to tell it, he must break with the traitorous tempter, and part from her; and if he does not do this, it is precisely his ordinary, noble impulse toward truth, which even in jest and in the face of treason he cannot deny, that drives him on to destruction.

Expositors find the answer of Samson very difficult to be understood, but needlessly. Delilah had in her apartment a weaver's loom, at which she worked. It was doubtless of the upright, primitive form. It is probable that the technical terms connected with the weaver's art in Egypt were also prevalent on the Phœnician coast. Weaving women have also been found depicted on Egyptian monuments. The word מִסְבָּת signifies the web on the loom. Hesychius (cf. Schleusner, Thes. iii. 529) has a form μέσαστον, which is explained to mean "weaver's-beam." It is then added: "Some make it mean ἄντρον, others μερόστων." The latter word is manifestly מִסְבָּת, and the same as μερόστων, which only the LXX. know, and is certainly not Greek, although ἄντρον occurs elsewhere.

The Targum represents it by מִסְבָּתָא, which is evidently derived from the same technical expression. Delilah is to work the hair of Samson, who places himself near the loom, into her web as woof. This could only be done from above. Herodotus (ii. 35) informs us, that the Egyptians, unlike other nations, inserted the woof, not from below upward, but from above downward. Samson's locks were long enough to form a close and perfect web; for it is added that she also struck in the בָּטֵן, the batten, in order to show that it was a regular piece of weaving. בָּטֵן is what Homer calls the κεκλις, staff, equivalent to our "batten." The Greek κεκλις, also, means a pin, nail, just as the Hebrew בָּטֵן does elsewhere. During the weaving, Samson had fallen asleep. Had he been unable to extricate his hair, he would at least have been unfree in his movements. But at the cry "Philistines!" he awakes. He gives one wrench, and the web tears, the batten shoots out, and the seven locks are free. They are called מִסְבָּתָא.

a word found only here. It comes from חָלַף, not, however, from that which means "to change," but from the equivalent of πλέω, with which, consonant changes being taken into account, it is identical (חָלַף = פָּלַח = פָּלַךְ = πλέω). The πλόκαμοι, locks, are seven, in accordance with the sacred number of perfection and consecration. Delilah finds herself deceived for the third time. The Philistines become impatient and dubious. No mention is made this third time of a spy, awaiting the issue of the trial. Even the second time, it is not stated, as at the first attempt, that the Philistines brought her the cords. The woman sees herself defrauded of her large gains, and turned into a laughing-stock besides. She therefore brings everything to bear to overcome the hero. She employs all her arts to torment him. He does not love her—has no heart for her—has deceived her: such is the gamut on which her tears and prayers are pitched. In point of fact, the threefold reproach is a threefold injustice. The three answers he has given, looked at carefully, form as it were an enigma, in which the truth lies concealed: in the first, the "seven;" in the second, the "consecration;" in the third, the "locks." He is really too great to lie; and therefore he falls a victim. Had he only lied thoroughly, lied once more, he had been free. The Philistines would not have returned; Delilah would have ceased. But Samson's history is a finished tragedy. He falls by reason of his greatness, which hinders him from avoiding the thrust of the serpent whom he has once suffered to approach his heel.

Samson's pliability has met with sufficiently frivolous apprehension. "Strong Samson," says Rousseau (Emile, ed. 1782, iii. p. 200), "was not so strong as Delilah." This is erroneous. It was because he was so strong and Delilah so weak, that he fell. He stumbled over an opponent who was too little to contend with. Rousseau compares him with Hercules in his relations to Omphale. This also is incorrect. That myth is nothing but a representation of the sun, who as hero descends into the lap of repose. It has no dramatic-historical interest. Omphale makes no demand of anything with which the prosperity and freedom of a nation are connected. Nor is it more correct to look for analogies among the tasks which, in tradition and poetry, are imposed on lover-heroes by their mistresses. Those are mere trials of strength, without moral character. The historian of the Incas says, panegyrically, of Huayna Capac, one of the last monarchs of Peru (died 1525), that "he was never known to refuse a woman, of whatever age or degree she might be, any favor that she asked of him" (Prescott, Peru, i. 339, note). Samson had certainly refused Delilah, had he not been so great in his strength, so unique in his manifestation, so elevated above his time, so true even in evasion, so earnest in sport. The weakness of Pericles for Aspasia, even if not without influence on affairs of state, was not dramatic—for they mutually valued each other; but Samson's love is tragic, because the play in which in his greatness he indulges, causes his feet to slide on account of it.

1 חָלַף occurs only here; cf. ἀλάτος, ἀλάτνω. Similar is חָלַף, hunger.

2 In the Middle Ages it was believed that she had stupefied him by means of opium. This view transmitted itself even into the "Chroulcon Engelhusi," in Leibnitz, Script.

Vers. 15, 16. And his soul was vexed unto death. If Samson remained, he must succumb. The national hero of Israel who cannot separate himself from a Philistine woman, must fall. In vain has he sought three times to put her off with a jest. The avarice and knavery of such women are not to be escaped from by witty turns. She knows that at last he cannot hide the truth from her. Precisely his greatness and fearlessness enable her to compass his destruction. He remains; and she does not cease her efforts, until at last he is wearied of her ceaseless teasing (וְהָיָה לְדָלִיָּהּ).<sup>1</sup>

She bored him to death (וְהָיָה לְדָלִיָּהּ) with tears and reproaches. He wished to have rest—and to remain; nothing was left, therefore, but to grant her wish. Such is the philosophy of many husbands who yield to women ambitious of rule. To be sure, they are their wives, before God and men, and the danger is not always so great as here. Samson, although he remains, finds himself so plagued, that in order to quiet Delilah, everything else is indifferent to him. He determines to tell her the true reason of his great strength. But will she not wish to test the truth of what he tells her? and will he not thereby lose his strength? He considers it not. But this strength which he puts in jeopardy, it is not his own possession? He does not reflect. It was given him for the freedom of his people against the Philistines. But he will tell her the truth, come what may, in order to have peace. Delilah had doubtless promised him not to abuse his secret. He believes her promise, if only he can silence her. He was wearied to death, so that his courage, the freshness of his mind, and his passion for victory were benumbed—and all that, when one step out of her house would have set him free! Abstinence unfolded his strength: Delilah in the Wine-Valley (Nachal Sorek) put it to sleep.<sup>2</sup> When he killed lions, he was full of happiness and relish for life: now, he is wearied unto death. In Timnah, his wife betrays him, and affords him an opportunity for a glorious victory: now, he betrays himself, and falls.

Ver. 17. If I be shaven, then my strength will go from me. Expositors, from the earliest ages down, have here made mention of the Greek myth of king Nisus of Megara, and have even regarded it as a disfigurement of what is stated here. But on closer inspection of the sources whence we derive our knowledge of the Greek myth, the greater part of the analogy which it seems to offer with our narrative falls away, and the idea from which it springs is seen to be very different. It is nowhere stated that Nisus would lose his dominion if his hair were shaved off; but only that on his gray head there grew a single purple hair, with which his fortune was connected (Apollod. xv. 2: πορφύρεαν ἐν μέσῳ τῇ κεφαλῇ τρίχα; cf. Ovid. Metam. viii. 8: "Splendidus (crinis) ostro inter honoratos medio de vertice canos.")<sup>3</sup> It is true that his daughter betrayed him; but that was not his fault. Not he, but his daughter, was blinded by sensual love for the enemy. The principal idea, the weakness of Samson himself, is wholly unrepresented. Why only the purple hair contained this fiducia magni regni, we are not informed. But it must probably be explained by the assumption of some connection with the purple light of the Sun, and the vast knowledge which that deity was supposed to possess — thus making it a pledge of wisdom rather than strength; for Nisus was no Hercules. This view is corroborated by the different turn given to the idea in popular traditions. For just as Christianity portrayed the devil as one who arrogates the power and appearance of the light, and presents himself as an angel of light, so popular conceptions have represented him with a cock's feather, as the symbol of light, and from a kindred point of view, have invented the charm of "golden devil's-hairs" to attain to universal knowledge (cf. my Eddischen Studien, p. 86). In all this there is no resemblance to the life-like, historical picture here drawn of Samson. Still, it cannot be denied that the Biblical narrative has apparently furnished the basis of many superstitious distortions, however coarse most of them may be. Among these the case of Apollonius of Tyana, whom Domitian caused to be shaved, is not to be reckoned, however; for that was probably only designed to inflict dishonor. But it is not delusive to find one of them in the opinion that magicians and witches were insensible to torture, until the hair had been shaven from the whole body — an opinion which led to many detestable proceedings, but was also speedily condemned by many (cf. Martin Delrio, Disquis. Magicæ, lib. v. § 9, pp. 764 f., ed. Cöln. 1679; Paulini (1709), Philosoph. Luststunden, ii. 169; Schedius, De Diis Germanis (1728), p. 388).

Rev. Brunser. Illustr. Inscr. II. 989: "Samson opio potatus," etc.

3 Cf. Hyginus, Fab. 196: purpureum crinem. Virgil, Grise. ver. 121: Candida cæsaris . . . et roseus medio fulgebant vertice crinis. The "golden hairs" of Schwarz (Urspr. der Mythol. p. 144) are therefore to be corrected, as also Bæthens's "protecting hair."

Ver. 18. And Delilah saw that he had told her all his heart. Old Jewish expositors say that she knew this because "words of truth are readily recognizable," and because she felt sure that he would not "take the name of God in vain." She followed up her discovery with proceedings sufficiently satanical. She at once sent to the Philistine chiefs to request them to visit her once more. This time he had undoubtedly opened his heart to her. She did not, however, intoxicate him, and proceed to her work, before they came. They must first bring the money with them. As for them, they soon made their appearance, and, concealed from Samson, awaited her call.

Ver. 19. And his strength went from him. As soon as the seven locks of his head had fallen, he ceased to possess the superhuman strength which had hitherto resided in him. But in the beginning of his history, in the annunciation of his birth and character to his parents, it is not intimated that by reason of the hair which no razor was to touch, he should possess such strength. Nor is it anywhere mentioned that Samson, the child, was already in possession of this giant strength, as soon as his hair had grown long. On the contrary, it is said, "And Jehovah blessed him." Had it been his long hair that made him so strong, there would have been no necessity for the Spirit of Jehovah to "come upon him," when he was about to perform some great deed for which the occasion presented itself. What sort of strength his long locks, as such, could give him, is clearly seen when nothing but God's intervening help saves him from perishing through thirst. The growth of the unshaven hair on the head of a Nazarite, was only a token of his consecration, not the consecration itself. Similarly, the seven locks of Samson were only the sign of his strength, not the strength itself.<sup>1</sup> The strength of Samson depended, not on the external locks, but on the consecration of which they were the symbol. Hence, he needed God's help and Spirit, and received his strength not because of his long hair, but because of his vocation.<sup>2</sup> For God's nearness is granted not to all whose hair is long, but only to those devoted to his service. But just as in Israel he ceased to be a Nazarite who shaved his hair, so Samson's consecration departed from him when he removed its sign. When he failed to withstand Delilah, he surrendered not so much his hair, as his divine consecration. He denies his election to be a "Nazir of God," when he gives his hair to profanation. His consecration was broken, for he voluntarily allowed it to be profaned by the hands of the Philistine woman; his courage was broken, for he had done what he would not do; his joyousness was broken, when he yielded with half his heart, wearied, and in conflict with himself; his conscience was broken, and would not be drowned in the intoxication of Sorek-grapes; his manhood is broken, for he is no longer a whole man who, in a waking dream, betrays the sanctuary and glory of his life to the enemy: in a word, his strength is broken; and of all this, his fallen locks are not the cause, but the sign. The departure of his strength is not an externally caused, but an inwardly grounded moral result. Virgil says (Æneid, iv. 705) that the real life flame (calor) of the deceased Dido ceased to exist only with the severing of the hair from her head. This idea, raised into the sphere of moral truth, applies to Samson. His long hair was no amulet, conditioning the enjoyment of the Spirit of God — for without it the Spirit rested on Gideon and Jephthah, filling them with heroic virtue; but when, with a restless heart, he consciously threw himself and his people, for wine and love, into the power of the harlot, he became a broken hero. Since he himself says, and fully believes, that his strength is in his hair, and nevertheless gives himself up, it is evident that a breach has opened between his passions and his reason; and this breach made him a broken man. This moral rupture distinguishes Samson's fall from similar histories. The legend concerning Sheikh Shehabeddin, in the "Forty Viziers" (ed. Behrman, p. 25) is in many respects shaped after the catastrophe of Samson; but the arts by which he escapes from the Sultan who persecutes him, are those of magic. When a woman finally persuades him to betray his secret, it turns out that it consists only in certain external washings. All moral interest is wanting, both in the attack and in the defense. The Siegfried legend in the Nibelungen is more beautiful. The wounded part of the hero is also entirely external; but its betrayal is wrought by love, not by malice. Chriemhild, from love to her husband, becomes the discloser of his weakness, which a man betrays. In Slavic (cf. Wenzig, p. 190) and North German legends (cf. Müllenhoff, p. 406) magicians and strong persons do not carry their hearts about with them, but keep them wonderfully concealed. It is only by women's arts that opponents ascertain where it is. The primitive, moral ideas contained in these legends, are disfigured under the wrappings of childish distortions.

Ver. 20. And she said, The Philistines are upon thee! In previous trials, cords and weaver's loom had shown Delilah and her confederates the unimpaired condition of Samson's strength. This time, rendered confident by Delilah's word, the Philistine chiefs are themselves present. Samson rises, recling, from sleep, sees the thick crowd, and, thinking that everything is as formerly, says: "I will go out to battle as at other times!" He suits the action to the word—but—

He wist not that Jehovah was departed from him. Appropriately does the narrator substitute "Jehovah" here for "strength," thus confirming what has been remarked above. The Spirit of strength, consecration to God, integrity of soul, the fullness of enthusiasm, the joyousness of the unbroken heart, were no longer his. This is already apparent from the fact that he did not know that God had left him. Whoever has God, knows it; whomsoever He has left, knows it not. When he was near his end, he could pray; but now, in his state of semi-intoxication and intellectual obscuration, he can neither fight as formerly, nor call on God, and so—he falls.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Samson was a Nazarite. He bore the sign of the general priesthood. The consecration of God was upon his head. It fired his will, gave his strength, and guided his error into the way of salvation. But when he profaned it, and in weakness allowed Delilah's unholy hand to touch it, he lost both strength and victory. God left him, because he held the honor of his God cheaper than his own pleasures. Because he gave up that which he knew was not his own, God left him in dishonor to find his way to penitence. He who could not withstand the allurements of a woman, even when they demanded the surrender of his vocation, was not worthy any more to withstand the enemy. His eyes, blinded by sensuality, saw not the treason: soon, blinded by the enemy, he should see neither sun, nor men, but only God. That done, he turned back, and God came back to him.

It is not a beautiful comparison which is sometimes instituted between Delilah and Judas the traitor. For Samson was in fault, and Delilah was a Philistine. The woman is more excusable than the disciple who rose against his pure Master. But Samson is the type of all such children of men as know God, praise his grace, pray to Him, derive strength and love from Him, and yet fall. Sin is the ever present Delilah, who caused David, the Singer, to fall, and brought him to tearful repentance. Samson himself, rather than Delilah, was for a moment the traitor, who delivered the honor of his Lord to the insults of the enemy. Let no one think that he can safely enter danger. Pride goes before a fall. Self-confidence comes to a bad end; only confidence in God conducts through temptation. It is very proper to pray: Lord, lead me not into temptation; but very far from proper to enter into it of one's own free-will.

The lust of the eyes is not guiltless. It is the gate to the most carnal desires. Sin always tortures, even as Delilah tortured Samson. It is never wearied in its efforts to induce virtue to betray itself. Flee, if thou canst not withstand! To flee from sin is heroism. Had Samson but run away from Delilah, as a coward runs, he had surely smitten the Philistines. Every lapse into sin must be repented of. None of us have aught wherein to glory, but all stand in need of repentance. When Saul recognized his sin in having persecuted Jesus, he became blind. But soon he saw, like Samson, no one but his Saviour.

"Make me blind,
So I but see thee, Saviour kind."

STARKE: Even great and holy persons may fall into gross sins, if they do not watch over themselves.—THE SAME: To uncover our whole heart to God is our duty, but we are not bound to do it to our fellow-men.—THE SAME: In the members with which men sin against God, they are also usually punished by God.—GERLACH: Samson thinks to hold as his own, and to use as he pleases, that which was only lent to him, and of the borrowed nature of which his Nazarite distinction continually reminded him. It is thus that he prepares his deep fall for himself.—[WORDSWORTH: Samson replied to Delilah's temptations by three lies; Christ replied to the devil's temptation by three sayings from the Scripture of truth.—TR.]

CHAPTER XVI. 21–31.

- 21 But [And] the Philistines took him, and put out his eyes, and brought him down to Gaza ['Azzah], and bound him with fetters of brass;<sup>1</sup> and he did grind in the 22 prison-house. Howbeit the hair of his head began to grow again after<sup>2</sup> he was 23 shaven. Then [And] the lords [princes] of the Philistines gathered them [themselves] together, for to offer a great sacrifice unto Dagon their god, and to rejoice:
24 for they said, Our god hath delivered Samson our enemy into our hand. And when [omit: when] the people saw him, [and] they praised their god: for they said, Our god hath delivered into our hands our enemy, and the destroyer [devastator] of our 25 country [land]; which slew many of us [who multiplied our slain]. And it came to pass, when their hearts were merry, that they said, Call for [omit: for] Samson that he may make us sport.<sup>3</sup> And they called for [omit: for] Samson out of the prison-house; and he made them sport: and they set him between the pillars.

26 And Samson said unto the lad that held him by the hand, Suffer me that I may feel [touch]<sup>4</sup> the pillars whereupon the house standeth, that I may lean upon them.
 27 Now the house was full of men and women: and all the lords [princes] of the Philistines were there: and there were upon the roof about three thousand men
 28 and women, that beheld [looked on] while Samson made sport. And Samson called unto the Lord [Jehovah], and said, O Lord God [Jehovah], remember me, I pray thee, and strengthen me, I pray thee, only this once, O God, that I may be at once
 29 avenged<sup>5</sup> of the Philistines for my two eyes. And Samson took hold of the two middle pillars upon which the house stood, and on which it was borne up [and he leaned upon them], of [on] the one with his right hand, and of [on] the other with 30 his left. And Samson said, Let me die with the Philistines. And he bowed himself with all his [omit: all his] might; and the house fell upon the lords [princes], and upon all the people that were therein. So the dead which he slew at his death
 31 were more than they which he slew in his life. Then [And] his brethren and all the house of his father came down, and took him, and brought him up, and buried him between Zorah and Eshtaol in the burying-place of Manoah his father. And he judged Israel twenty years.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 21. — Dr. Cassel translates, "put him in fetters (Ketten);" and adds the following foot-note: "כַּשְׁמֵיטִים, as at 2 Kgs. xxv. 7, etc., are iron fetters (eiserne Ketten), compare our expression to lie in irons. The fetter consisted of two corresponding parts, hence the dual." The word "iron" in this note is probably to be taken in the general sense of "metal," for כַּשְׁמֵיטִים unquestionably means "brass fetters." — Ta.]

[2 Ver. 22. — מִיָּמִיד: "about the time that," or "as soon as." The word intimates that Samson was not long in the wretched condition of prisoner. As soon as his hair began measurably to grow, the events about to be related occurred. So Bertheau and Kell. — Ta.]

[3 Ver. 25. — יִשְׁחַקְלֵנוּ. Like the E. V., Dr. Cassel, De Wette, and Bunsen (Bibelwerk), adopt general renderings, which leave the kind of sport afforded by Samson, and the way in which he furnished it, undetermined. Bush remarks that "It is quite improbable that Samson, a poor blind prisoner, should be required actively to engage in anything that should make sport to his enemies." But the decidedly active expression in the next clause, וַיִּצְחַק לְפָנֵיהֶם, can scarcely be interpreted of a mere passive submission to mockery on the part of Samson (cf. also ver. 27). The word צָחַק (שָׂחַק is a softening of the same form) is used of mimic dances, cf. Ex. xxxii. 6; 1 Sam. xviii. 7; 2 Sam. vi. 5, 21, etc. There is surely no great improbability in supposing that the Philistines in the height of their revels should call upon "a poor, blind prisoner" to execute a dance, for their own delectation and for his deeper humiliation; while, on the other hand, Samson's acquiescence may be explained from his desire to gain a favorable opportunity for executing his dread design. After the fatiguing dance, his request to be permitted to "lean upon" the pillars would appear very natural. — Ta.]

4 Ver. 23. — מִיָּשָׁם (instead of the erroneous כַּשְׁמֵיטִים, from a root יָשָׁם, which does not occur): from שָׁשׁ, שָׁשׁ, μάσσω, to touch; onomatopoeitic, like palpare.

[5 Ver. 28. — וְאַתָּה תִּקְחֵם נִקְמָה בְּעֵינַי. Dr. Cassel's rendering is very similar to that of the E. V.: Dass ich noch einmal Vergeltung nehme um meiner zwei Augen willen — "let me once more take vengeance, this time for my two eyes." But unless נִקְמָה is here feminine, contrary to rule, this rendering is against the consonants, to say nothing of the vowel points. The text, as it stands, must be read: "that I be avenged with the vengeance of one (sc. eye, which is fem.) out of my two eyes." Compare the exegesis below. — Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Ver. 21. And the Philistines laid hold of him. The catastrophe is terrible. The fall of a hero is sorrowful and lamentable beyond anything else. Wretched enemies make themselves master of one who for twenty years had been victorious. In the giddiness of a broken spirit he succumbs to the multitude, as a wounded lion succumbs to a pack of yelping hounds. But even in this extremity, he must have given proof of the strength of his arm. The cruel precaution of the Philistines indicates this. They do not kill him, for they hate him too intensely; but even before they bring him to Gaza, they put out his eyes. He must be made powerless by blindness; not until then, they think, will it be wise to lay aside all fear of him. Well does the Jewish expositor remark on this infliction, that Samson now loses his eyes, and is fettered with chains, because heretofore he followed his eyes too much, and allowed himself to be fettered by the allurements of the senses. In what horrible sins will not the savage hatred of men engage! All cruelty is a frenzy of unbelief; but sin is ravaging mad when it offends against the eye, and stops up the fountain of light, life's source of joy and freedom. It does not excuse the Philistines that they are not the only ones who have resorted to this satanic practice. The practice, like every other sin, has its world-wide history. A profound and thoughtful myth concerning this matter is found in Herodotus (ix. 93), according to which the blindness of Evenius, a priest of the Sun-god, is punished on the false zealots who inflicted it. Nevertheless, this infernal fury has been familiar to men in every land on which the sun shines.<sup>1</sup> The monuments of Nineveh show us a king, who with his lance puts out the eyes of his prisoners, as Nebuchadnezzar caused to be done to Zedekiah, the fallen king of Judah. There existed even different theories of this cruel art. Among the Persians, as Procopius informs us (in his Persian Memorabilia, i. 6), it was usual either to pour red-hot oil into the eyes, or to dig them out with red-hot needles. The latter mode is probably expressed by the Hebrew

The story which represents Belisarius, the great hero of Justinian's reign, as deprived of his eyes, and begging for oboli in the streets of Constantinople, is a fiction of later times; but it falls far short of the unspeakable misery actually endured by Samson. The consciousness of the treason of which he had been guilty towards God, and which had been so terribly practiced toward himself; the fall from a height so glorious and prosperous, into an indescribable dishonor; the impotence of the formerly victorious freeman, the blindness of one so sharp-witted, the chains on his consecrated body, the yells of triumph of the cowardly foe, — all this overwhelmed his soul so powerfully, that one less great than he had died for grief. And his people kept silence. But the Philistines still feared him, even in his blindness. They fettered him with iron chains, and made him turn a mill in the prison.<sup>2</sup> Deeper dishonor could not be inflicted. For the hero of divine freedom was made to perform the work of a slave. It is well known that in antiquity the work of grinding was done by slaves (Ex. xi. 5; xii. 29). The slaves thus employed were moreover considered the lowest,<sup>3</sup> worth less money than any others, and as such found themselves in the worst situation (cf. Böckh, Statisthaushalt der Athenen, i. 95, ed. 2d). The depth of Samson's humiliation is as great as his former elevation. But in the midst of his untold sufferings, —

Ver. 22. The hair of his head began to grow again. With blinded eyes he began spiritually to see — fettered with chains he became free — under slavish labor he ripened for the freedom of God.

<sup>1</sup> If Herodotus is to be believed, the Scythians blinded every slave (iv. 2). Alexander Severus is reported to have said, that whenever he saw a bad judge he felt inclined to tear his eye out with his finger (Lampridius, 17; cf. Salmastius on the passage.)

While he was yet prosperous, the person of Delilah interposed between his sight and his calling and duty for his people; now, though blind and within prison walls, he saw the power and greatness of his God. He recognized his error, and repented. The greatness of the fallen Samson consisted in this, that, like all noble natures in similar circumstances, he became greater and freer in the deepest suffering than he had been before.

Vers. 23, 24. And the princes of the Philistines assembled themselves. A general feast of thanksgiving and sacrifices was to be celebrated in Gaza. This shows that Gaza was at that time the leading Philistine city, and that Dagon, the fish-shaped god (דָּג, fish), was regarded by them as the embodiment of the religious antithesis between them and Israel. Dagon, the sea-god, as it were, who protects the cities on the coast, over against the God of Israel, who has won the main land. The celebration arranged by the Philistines, attended by all their tribes and princes, testifies to the unheard-of terror inspired by Samson. The circumstance that they express their joy in the form of thanksgivings and sacrifices to their god, is, in itself considered, singular, seeing that they well knew by what foul means the victory had been gained; but it is none the less instructive. Israel could learn from it that the Philistines regarded every victory over one of their number as at the same time an act of their deity, — being better in this respect than the Israelites, who continually forgot the great deeds of their God.

Vers. 25–27. Call Samson that he may make us sport. The Philistine thanksgiving was like themselves. Men may be known by their feasts. Here there was no thought of humility. Seriousness also is wanting, although they remind themselves of their losses. The truth is, repentance, most attractive in prosperity, is unknown to heathen. They praise their god, it is true, but they do not pray. They celebrate a popular festival, characterized by eating, drinking, and boasting. They were in high spirits over a victory for which they had not fought. Their joy reaches its acme when they send for Samson. He is brought in, chained like a bear. A people shows its worst side when it heaps mockery and insult on a defenseless foe. How would the Romans have treated Hannibal had they taken him prisoner? How was Jugurtha treated, when he was dragged into Rome in the triumph of Marius? But this Numidian fox was rendered insane over the disgrace inflicted upon him (Plut., Vita Mar., 12). The blind lion of Israel, on the contrary, walks calmly on, already conscious of the restored consecration of God on his head. His appearance afforded the highest sport; and the circumstance that every Philistine could dare to touch and mock, and otherwise abuse the blind hero, raised their mirth to the highest pitch. But pride goes before a fall; and they did not yet sufficiently know the man whom they derided.

And they placed him between the pillars. Much has been written concerning the architectural style of the building in which the occurrence took place. Bertheau is not wrong in saying that it is impossible to come to any particular determination in this matter. It was not essential to our narrator's purpose to give an architectural description. Nevertheless, his language affords the materials for an intelligible conception. The design of placing Samson between the pillars was evidently to enable all to see him; in other words, to put him in the midst of the assembly. Now, according to ancient conceptions, Heaven and Atlas are keepers of pillars; and whether they hold fast<sup>1</sup> both pillars, or with their shoulders themselves constitute the pillars, they cannot leave their places without causing the heavens to fall. This poetical view is also found in Job xxvi. 11, where the pillars of the heavens reel at God's reproof. Of this conception the temple-building at Gaza was a representation. Two mighty pillars supported the chief beams of the vast building. Round about the house there ran a gallery, where the populace found a place. This was called גָּלֵרִי, the same term which is applied to the flat roofs of oriental houses, which, properly speaking, are only open galleries, surrounded by trellis-work. These estrades or galleries cannot have been supported by the main pillars;<sup>2</sup> for in that case many would not have been able to see Samson. The hero would be visible to all, only if he stood in the lower space, between the pillars on which the house was supported, the gallery extending around the sides of the house, and fastened to them; and there is nothing at variance with this in his request to the lad to be allowed to lean upon the pillars. On closer inspection, our narrator tells much more than is at first apparent. Samson was evidently previously acquainted with the arrangement of the building. He knew, too, that he had been placed in the centre, or it may have been told him by the lad. There were other pillars: perhaps a portico extended around the building. But Samson requests expressly to be led to the principal pillars, "on which the house rests." The lower part of the house was filled with אֲנָשִׁים וְנָשִׁים, men and women of distinction, together with the princes, and was called בֵּית הַמֶּלֶךְ; the gallery (גָּלֵרִי) contained three thousand persons, אֲנָשִׁים וְנָשִׁים, i. e., the common people. That this gallery was in the house, that is, under the covering upborne by the pillars, and hence fell with the house, is evident from ver. 30, where we read that the "house fell" upon all "that were therein."

Ver. 28. And Samson called unto Jehovah. This shows that he had fully recovered himself. As soon as he can pray again, he is the hero again. The prayer he now offers is full of fervor and intensity, rising heavenward like smoke from the altar of incense. It is the deep and vast complaint which, after the awful experiences of the last days, grief and hope have caused to gather in his soul. He uses all the names of God with which he is acquainted, and confesses Him, in the darkness which surrounds him, more deeply and fervently than formerly when enjoying the light of the sun. And withal, his thoughts are beautifully arranged. For fervor excels all homiletical art. The prayer divides into three parts, and makes use of three names of God. Each part contains three nicely separated thoughts. He begins: "Lord (אֲדֹנָי) Jehovah (יְהוָה), remember me." In the midst of servitude, chained and fettered by the Philistines, who lord it over him, bring him in and send him out as they choose, his spirit calls upon Admai, the Lord who is in heaven. In the midst of Philistine jubilations over the victory of their idol, the seeming triumph of their Dagon, he calls on Jehovah, the great God of Israel, for He alone is the Lord. Alone and forsaken, surrounded by raging foes, he cries to God: "Do thou remember me." The word זָכַר is most frequently used of God's gracious mindfulness of any one, expressing itself in caring for him. It is with a heart full of penitence that he makes this petition. For formerly God had departed from him, and he had been deprived of God's care over him. If now God but takes thought of him, he will once more be received into divine favor.

And strengthen me, only this once, O God. "Strengthen me." He no longer puts his trust in himself, nor yet in his growing hair. The source of the consecration and strength which formerly adorned him, and for the return of which he pleads, is in God. For this reason, he invokes God anew,—this time as אֱלֹהִים. Elohim, with the article, is the true, the only Elohim, namely, the God of Israel (cf. above, on ch. vi. 20 and 36; and on ch. viii. 3; xiii. 18). While all around him, the enemies praise their god as the victor (ver. 24), he prays to the God of Israel, that He, the real Elohim, the true strength, would strengthen him "yet this once." He does not ask to be the former Samson again. He has done with life. After such disgrace, he would not wish to return to it. Only for "this time," he prays for strength, which God gives and takes as He will, allowing no one to suppose, as Samson formerly did, that it is an inalienable possession, whether used or abused. In the third place, he declares the purpose for which he desires the strength:—

That I may yet once take vengeance on the Philistines, by reason of my two eyes. Is it right to pray thus? For Samson it is. For he was called to recompense the Philistines; his whole task was directed against the tyrants. He fell only because instead of avenging the wrongs of his people on their oppressors, he squandered his strength with the Philistine woman. If now he desires the restoration of his lost strength, he can lawfully do so only for the purpose for which it was originally given. To rend cords in pieces for sport was not his business, but to make the enemy acquainted with the power of the gracious God of Israel.

But may he then demand recompense for his "two eyes?" As Samson, he may. In his prayer, it is true, he did not plead his consecration as a "Nazarite of God;" in his humility he dares not use this plea, since a razor has passed over his head. But it was nevertheless on this account that he had his strength. It resided in him, not as man, but as Nazarite. It was not his, although he misused it; it was lent him, for his people, against the enemy. But now, his strength, even if fully restored, would avail him nothing. The loss of both his eyes rendered it useless. He could not, like a blind chieftain,—like Dandolo, the doge of Venice, and Ziska, the Bohemian,—lead his people to battle, for he is no chieftain, but a hero, who stands and fights alone. The loss of his eyes, therefore, closes his career. Blindness disables him from serving longer as the instrument of the God of Israel. Hence, he desires vengeance, not for

1 As implied in the words: ἔχει δὲ τὴν κίονα, Olys., l. 58.

2 As Stark thinks (Gaza, p. 332) whose conception is for all that by no means clear. Nor is it necessary to suppose that the pillars were wooden posts. In a building of such size, they were most likely of stone.

the scorn, dishonor, chains and prison, to which he has been subjected, but only for his two eyes<sup>1</sup> — had they left him but one! The vengeance he seeks is not for himself, but for his people and the God who chose him.

His language, it is true, contains the contrast of of one recompense (נָקָם) for his two eyes. The explanation is that he can strike but one blow more; but that one, in his mind and within his reach, will suffice for both eyes. He will inflict this blow on the Philistines, who all around him praise the idol who gave them victory, whereas it was only his former mental blindness that caused his fall, and his present physical blindness that gives them their sense of security.

Three times he attempted to withstand Delilah — three times he played with his strength, — and fell. Now, he prayed three times, to the thrice-named God, the triunity of Jehovah, for understanding and strength.

Ver. 29. And Samson took hold of the middle pillars. He shows himself in all his old greatness again. For the first time he stood again in a crowd of Philistines, and at once began to think of battle. And notwithstanding the wretched condition in which he found himself, he fixed at once on the point where he intends to execute his deed. His blindness becomes a means of victory. He stands between the central pillars, on which the building rests, and between which the distance is not great. Being blind, it may be allowed him to take hold of them, in order to support himself by them. (That לָקַח may mean to take hold of, although found in that sense only here, is shown by the analogy of the Sanskrit lābh, Greek λαμβάνειν, λαβειν.) He presses them firmly with both arms, and says: —

Ver. 30. Let me die with the Philistines. The very conception of the deed is extraordinary. While the Philistines rejoice, drink, and mock, worse than Belshazzar, and fancy the blinded hero deeply humiliated and put to shame, he, on the contrary, is about to perform the deed of a giant, and stands among them in the capacity of a warrior about to enter battle, who only tarries to commend his cause to God. It is true, he cannot do what he intends to do without losing his own life; but he lived only to conquer. Victory is more than life. To talk here of suicide is wholly unsuitable. He did not kill himself when plunged in the deepest dishonor. He is too great for cowardly suicide; for it is a species of flight, and heroes do not flee. No: the blinded man perceives that the present moment holds out an occasion for victory, and avails himself of it, notwithstanding that it must cost him his own life.<sup>2</sup> It is not as if he would have killed himself, had he escaped. He knows that if his deed be successful, he cannot escape. But he is also ready to die. He is reconciled with his God: his eyes have again seen Him who was his strength.

1 Consequently, I cannot follow the unsuitable exegesis which makes Samson ask to be avenged for one of his two eyes. That would be simple vindictiveness. The שְׁנֵי עֵינָיו is comparative. He desires a vengeance greater than his two eyes, and taken on account of them. The Jewish exegesis only follows a special homiletical idea, which at bottom understands "two eyes."

The tragedy ends terribly. Laughter and shout and drunken revel are at their highest, when Samson bends the pillars with great force:<sup>3</sup> they break, the building falls,<sup>4</sup> — a terrific crash, and the temple is a vast sepulchre. O Dagon, where is thy victory? O Gaza, where is thy strength? Princes and priests, together, with cups at their lips, and mockery in their hearts, are crushed by the falling stone. With piercing cries, the vast crowds are pressed together. The galleries, with their burdens, precipitate themselves upon the heads of those below. Death was swifter than any rescue; the change from the sounds of rejoicing to groans and the rattle of death, terrible as the lightning. In the midst of them, great and joyous, stood the hero, and met his death. Not now with the bone of an ass, but with pillars of marble, had he conquered the foe. Dagon's temple, with its thousands, had been heaped up as his grave-mound. Since Samson must die, he could not have fallen greater. Traitors, tormentors, mockers, enemies, tyrants, all lay at his feet. The blind hero died as the great victor, who, in penitence and prayer, expiated, by suffering and death, the errors of which he had been guilty.

The history of Samson excels all poetry. The simple narrative of it is at the same time adorned with the highest art. Its fidelity and truth are testified to by the heart of every reader. Without magic arts, with only natural grief and death, it is nevertheless full of spiritual marvels.

But who furnished the report of the last hours of the hero's life? Who escaped, so as to set forth his praying and acting? It would seem as if this also were not left quite unhinted by the brief narrative.

A lad, an attendant (עֶבֶד), leads him, when the Philistines call him in from the prison (ver. 26). It may be plausibly conjectured that this was no Philistine. It seems not improbable that Samson, the Judge, was followed into his prison by an attendant, whose fidelity continued unshaken. It enhanced the triumph of the Philistines to allow this. Upon this supposition, many points explain themselves. This attendant, then, may have furnished him with a description of the festive scene into the midst of which he was introduced, and informed him in what part of the building he was placed. From him he could also obtain guidance to the spot which he deemed it necessary to occupy. This attendant was in the secret of his prayer and purpose; and if we assume that he dismissed him before the catastrophe, we are at once enabled to explain how he could take up his peculiar position by the pillars without exciting attention. Thus the faithful follower escaped death, and quickly reported the event at home.

Ver. 31. And his brethren and all his father's house came down. This is the first hint we have of interest in Samson on the part of his brethren, and the house of his father. The haste, however, with which they proceeded to Gaza, and the great fellowship in which they did it, speak well for them. They may have arrived soon enough to see the heap of ruins, with its countless dead bodies, just as it fell. They took Samson and carried him up in solemn funeral procession (such is probably the meaning of וְהָיָה), to the burial-place of his father, who had not lived to see the sorrow of his great son.<sup>1</sup> The terrified Philistines permitted everything. Anguish and mourning reigned among them. Everything was in confusion—their princes were dead. And so the corpse of the hero who smote them more fearfully in death than in life, was borne in silent procession along their borders.

3 The occurrence in Paus. vi. 9 is not well adapted to be brought into comparison.

4 The terrors of a similar calamity, although on a smaller scale, were experienced by King Henry, the son of Barbarossa, in 1183, when the pillars and floor of the "Probstst." at Erfurt, gave way. Many perished. Only the king and the bishop, who sat in a niche, escaped (cf. Chron. Mont. Senni, under 1183, p. 48, ed. Mader). On the 21st of July, 1864, one of the granite pillars, which supported the dome of the Church of the Transfiguration, at St. Petersburg, broke. A frightful catastrophe ensued, as the church crumbled to pieces over the masses whom curiosity had drawn together.

And he judged Israel twenty years. This statement is here repeated in order to intimate that Samson's official term had not come to a close before the events just related, but terminated with it.

Samson lived and died in conflict with the national enemies, the Philistines. The same fate has befallen his history and its exposition, from the time of Julian the imperial Philistine to that of many writers of the last centuries. It was especially in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries that irreverence was too often called criticism, and that frivolous insipidity was considered free inquiry. The æsthetic vapidity which was in part banished from the field of classical and German literature, continued to nestle in the exegesis of the Old Testament.<sup>2</sup> Joh. Philipp Heine may indeed have been right in saying (Dissertat. Sacra, p. 259), that the mockery at Samson's jaw-bone and foxes, had an ulterior object in view; but it was for the most part the Philistine-like, prosaic character which ordinarily marks genuine unbelief, that was unable to comprehend and rightly estimate the wonderful drama of Samson's life. An unfruitful comparison with Hercules was constantly iterated, although deeper insight clearly shows that, apart from the lion-conquest common to both, Hercules is of all Greek heroes the least suitable to be compared with Samson. The ingenuity of the earlier ecclesiastical teachers might, nevertheless, have led them to this comparison. But according to Piper (Myth. der Christl. Kunst, i. 131), primitive Christian art never represented even so much as the conflict of Samson with the lion; and later works of art connected Hercules with David as well as with Samson. Menzel (Symbolik, ii. 380), is of opinion that the representation of Samson, in the act of tearing open the jaws of the lion, over French and German church-doors of the Middle Ages, is an imitation of similar Mithras pictures. The representation of Samson with one foot on the lion, while with his hands he throttles him, typical in Byzantine pictures, is essentially the same conception (Schäfer, Handbuch der Malerei, p. 127). The noblest conception of him in modern poetry, is that of Milton's Samson Agonistes; but that drama treats only the end of Samson's life, and notwithstanding its lofty thoughts and Christian fervor disfigures the beautiful simplicity of Scripture by operative additions. Händel's oratorio, Samson (performed for the first time in London, October 12, 1742), the text of which is by Milton, but not worthy of the great subject, is celebrated. The esteemed composer, Joachim Raff, intended to prepare a Samson opera; but whether it was ever performed I do not know. At what a low ebb the appreciation of the Book of Judges and of Samson stood in the last century, is shown by Herder's dialogue (Geist der Ebräisch. Poesie, Werke, ii. 204), in which the poet endeavors indeed to elevate the narrative, but can only find its "most characteristically peculiar and beautiful features," in matters incidental to the main story.

It is not quite clear how the Roman Catholic legend made a physician of Samson;<sup>3</sup> and it was certainly far from appropriate when a jurist of the seventeenth century (La Mothe leayer, died 1672) represented him as the model of a skeptical thinker.<sup>4</sup> He is a type of the ancient people Israel itself (cf. the Introduction), which is everywhere victorious, so long as it preserves its consecration intact, but falls into servitude and bondage as soon as it profanes its own sacred character. The types of the ancient Church fathers, in which they compare the life and sufferings of Samson with Christ, are very ingenious; and the pure and elevated disposition they manifest therein, finding spirit because they seek it, is greatly to be admired. A wood-carving over the choir-chairs in the Maulbronn monastery represents Samson with long waving hair, riding on the lion, the symbol of death, whose jaws he tears apart; while, on the opposite side, the unicorn lies in the lap of the Virgin,—together symbolizing the birth and resurrection of Christ. For to him applies the saying of the Apostle (Heb. xi. 32, 33), that by faith he stopped the mouths of lions.

It is worthy of mention that while the names of the other Judges, Othniel, Ehud, Barak, Gideon, Jephthah, scarcely ever recur among the Jews, that of Samson was frequently used, both anciently and in modern times.

In the address of Samuel (1 Sam. xii. 11), the name of a hero Bedan is inserted between Jerubbaal and Jephthah, who can be none other than Samson. The reading Bepda of the LXX. is without any probability in its favor. Bedan is Ben Dan (literally, "Son of Dan"), i. e., "the Danite." The familiar use of this name in honor of the tribe, was undoubtedly connected with the blessing of Jacob on Dan, which after the life of Samson must have seemed to have special reference to him: "Dan shall judge his people, as one of the tribes of Israel." The primitive consciousness of the prophecy of Jacob reveals itself herein; and nowhere could it be said with more profound significance than here,—"I wait for thy salvation, O Jehovah" (Gen. xlix. 18).

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Samson, having found his God again, died as a hero. His brethren carried him into his father's grave. His victory was greater in death than in life.

Ancient expositors compare his death with that of Christ. But Samson gave up his life in order to cause his enemies to die: Christ in order to give them life. Samson died gladly because he had found his God again; in Christ God was never lost. It is, however, a good death, when one sees himself restored to communion with God. If the Christian, in the last brief hour of the cross, holds fast his faith, the thousand foes let loose against him by sin and temptation fall before him. When a Christian suffers, the representatives of evil place themselves round about him with laughter and mockery; and if he endures, his victory in death is greater than in life. Strong as Samson, was the weak woman Perpetua (in the second century); in the midst of tortures she said, "I know that I suffer, but I am a Christian." Thousands of martyrs have died as Samson died. They have conquered through the cross, and have heaped mountains of dishonor upon their enemies. But they were not all buried by their brethren. They found no places in their fathers' graves. Only He from whom nothing is hidden knows where they lie. At the last day they shall rise, and the eyes of them all shall be free from tears. Samson was alone; he also died alone. For his people he fought alone and suffered alone. After his death, the tribe of Judah raised itself again to faith. The remembrance of Samson preceded the deeds of David. Let no one fear to stand alone, whether in suffering or in conflict. The words of a faithful heart are not spoken in vain. The seed falls, not into the blue sky, but into God's living kingdom, and in its spring time will surely rise.

STARKE: The eyes of the mind are better than the eyes of the body. We can better spare the latter than the former. — THE SAME: For God and native land life itself is not to be accounted dear, but should gladly be surrendered; and he alone who does this is truly entitled to the name of a valiant hero. Thus, also, didst thou, O Saviour, our better Samson, conquer in dying. — GERLACH: Samson sported before the Philistines, not as one who, fallen from a merely human height, endeavors with smiling scorn to maintain his self-consciousness amid the downfall of the perishable things of this world, but deeply impressed with the vanity of everything that seeks to set itself up against the Lord — of "the vain war of the earthen pots against the rock" of which Luther speaks — and therefore seizing with faith on the renewed promises of divine grace. — THE SAME: He becomes thoroughly convinced that, mutilated in his face, he could never again live among men, exposed to the scorn of the enemies of the Lord, and that therefore his work is done; his play is turned into bitter earnestness, and while he falls and dies, he gains the greatest victory of his whole life.

THE HISTORY OF MICAH'S PRIVATE TEMPLE AND IMAGE-WORSHIP: SHOWING THE INDIVIDUAL ARBITRARINESS OF THE TIMES, AND ITS TENDENCY TO SUBVERT AND CORRUPT THE RELIGIOUS INSTITUTIONS OF ISRAEL.

CHAPTER XVII. 1-13.

- 1 And there was a man of Mount Ephraim, whose name was Micah [Micayehu].
- 2 And he said unto his mother, The eleven hundred shekels of silver that were taken from thee,<sup>1</sup> about which thou cursedst, and spakest of also in mine ears, behold, the silver is with me; I took it. And his mother said, Blessed be thou of the Lord
- 8 [Jehovah], my son. And when he had [And he] restored the eleven hundred shekels of silver to his mother, [and] his mother said, I had wholly dedicated<sup>2</sup> the silver unto the Lord [Jehovah] from my hand for my son, to make a graven image
- 4 and a molten image:<sup>3</sup> now therefore I will restore it unto thee. Yet [And] he restored the money [silver] unto his mother; and his mother took two hundred shekels of silver, and gave them to the founder, who made thereof a graven image

5 and a molten image: and they were in the house of Micah [Micayehu]. And the man Micah had an house of gods [a "Beth Elohim," God's-house], and made an ephod, and teraphim, and consecrated [appointed] one of his sons, who [and he] became his priest. In those days there was no king in Israel, but every man did that which was right in his own eyes. And there was a young man out of Beth-lehem-judah of the family of Judah, who was a Levite, and he sojourned there [temporarily]. And the man departed out of the city from [out of] Beth-lehem-judah, to sojourn where he could find a place: and he came to mount Ephraim to the house of Micah, as he journeyed. And Micah said unto him, Whence comest thou? And he said unto him, I am a Levite of Beth-lehem-judah, and I go to sojourn where I may find a place. And Micah said unto him, Dwell [Abide] with me, and be unto me a father and a priest, and I will give thee ten shekels of silver by the year, and a suit of apparel, and thy victuals. So the Levite went in. And the Levite was content [consented] to dwell with the man, and the young man was [became] unto him as one of his sons. And Micah consecrated [appointed] the Levite; and the young man became his priest, and was in the house of Micah. Then said Micah, Now know I that the Lord [Jehovah] will do me good, seeing I have a Levite to [seeing the Levite has become] my priest.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 2. — וְאִשֶּׁר לָקַח לָהּ. לָהּ is the dat. incommodi. Strictly speaking, לָהּ simply marks some sort of relation, the exact nature of which must be otherwise determined. The present phrase, rendered as literally as possible, is: "which (so. הַזֶּה) was taken for thee," cf. our popular use of the same phrase, and the German, welches dir genommen ward. Ewald (who with characteristic self-confidence announces that he must leave the "silly absurdity" of the ordinary explanation of this passage "to those who do not hesitate to find their own folly in the Bible,") seems to take לָהּ as the dative of the author: the money taken (received) by thee from my father. For he relates, quite in historical style, that a young man of Mount Ephraim, whose father probably died early, took the money which had been left to his mother into his own hands, in order by using to increase it (!); and that, followed by his mother's blessing, he was fortunate, and was about to restore the money to her, as became a dutiful son, when she made him a present of it in the shape of a handsome (schmucken) god, etc. The perfect וְהָיָה לָהּ, he says, is the perfect of volition (like וְהָיָה לָהּ, ver. 3): "I will take; it is my will to take." But if the Hebrew author meant to tell this story, he expressed himself very obscurely. The imprecatory oath, too, is thus left without explanation. And notwithstanding all Ewald's efforts in behalf of him, Micah is still in suspicious possession of the money (וְהָיָה לָהּ), before he tells his mother that he will take it. Under such circumstances, the benediction which, according to Ewald, the mother pronounces on her son, might be more politic than free. —Tr.]

[2 Ver. 3. — וְהָיָה לָהּ. Render: "I verily dedicate." Although Dr. Cassel also translates here by the pluperfect, he explains it of the present, see below. On this use of the perfect cf. Gen. Gram. 126, 4. The word "wholly" of the E. V. is better omitted. The infin. absolute in this construction is intensive, not extensive. It does not assert the completeness of the consecration, but simply makes it prominent, as being the use to which she determines to put the money. Cf. Gen. 181, 8. —Tr.]

[3 Ver. 3. — וְהָיָה לָהּ. Dr. Cassel: Bild und Gusswerk, "image and cast-work"; i. e., an image of wood or stone covered with a thin coating of silver or gold, see below. This explanation, although concurred in by several critics, is not yet sufficiently certain to make it worth while to disfigure our English text by inserting it. —Tr.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

After the story of Samson's heroic life and death, there follow in conclusion two narratives, of which the first embraces chaps. xvii. and xviii., the second chaps. xix.-xxi. Though not connected with each other either by time or place, they are nevertheless not mere accidental appendages to the preceding historical narrative, but essential parts of the well-considered organism of the entire Book, in consequence of which also they received the position in which we find them. The profound pragmatism of the Book (see Introduction, sect. 1) designs to show, that the heroic period of the Judges is full indeed of the wonders of God's compassion, but lacks that organic centralization and unity which only the kingly office, rightly instituted and rightly exercised, could afford. This want manifested itself even under the greatest Judges. The influence of the Judge extended, for the most part, only over the individual tribes to which he belonged, while in others it was not seldom resisted; and, being wholly personal in its nature, disappeared from his house as soon as he died.

In chaps. xvii. and xviii. another lesson is brought forward, hints of which had already occurred in earlier parts of the Book. The religious central point of the nation, also, became unsettled. And this was the greater danger. The sanctuary at Shiloh, the law and covenant of God that were in the sacred ark, were the real pillars of Israel's nationality. The existence of this spiritual unity was brought out in the opening sentence of the Book: "And after the death of Joshua, the sons of Israel asked Jehovah." It had in dark times demonstrated itself to be the guaranty of national cohesion. The tribes were twelve, indeed, and their cities lay scattered from Beer-sheba to the sources of the Jordan; but there was but one sanctuary, where the God of Israel was inquired of. It appeared, however, that the long-continued want of a closer political organization, threatened also the unity of the religious organism. For not only was the service of foreign idols introduced, threatening the nerve of popular strength and national freedom, but subjective superstition, also, and inconsiderate division, asserted themselves within the religious organization. This is shown by the story of Micah's sanctuary.

Ver. 1. And there was a man of mount Ephraim, and his name was Micayehu. Avarice, the Apostle tells us, is the root of all evil. Covetousness, like all sin, knows no shame. Its lustful eyes profane even that which is holy. The treasures of temples have ever excited the rapacity of savage enemies. The gifts of the pious convert houses of prayer into objects of envy. Faithful Israelites, who believed in Jehovah, went to Shiloh, in Ephraim, performed their pious duties, inquired of God after truth, prayed, and brought their offerings for the honor and maintenance of the house of God. Among those who did this, was doubtless also the father of Micayehu. For that he confessed Jehovah, is evident from the name which he gave to his son: מִיכָיְהוּ, "who is like Jehovah." Such names are only given in homes where Jehovah is honored, at least in appearance. The mere fact, however, that persons are named "Theodore,"<sup>1</sup> "Nathaniel," "Theophilus," or other like names, gives no assurance that they are what their names declare them to be. The father of Micayehu must also have been rich; for he left his widow large sums of money. The latter, according to all appearances, was avaricious; and it was probably on this account that true faith in Jehovah took no root in her heart, although the name of Jehovah was often on her lips.

Ver. 2, 3. Behold, here is the money; I took it. The rich woman had been deprived of a large sum of money. Eleven hundred shekels, at that time, evidently represented a very considerable amount; large enough to be spoken of in "round figures." The woman was beside herself; her soul was in her money; and so she cursed the thief. Cursing is still a frightful oriental custom. It was regarded as an invocation of judgments from heaven. Hence, the dread of the effects of curses, in heathenism, arose not only from faith, but still more from superstition. The sin was indeed engaged in, but the curse was dreaded; just as other thieves do not refrain from stealing, but guard themselves anxiously against the police. To this must be added that parental curses were feared as the heaviest of all bans (among the Greeks cf. Nägelsbach, Nachhom. Theol., p. 350). Sirach (iii. 9) still said in his day, that "the curse of a mother overturns the houses of children." Micah heard the awful imprecations of his mother's malediction, and shuddered. He could not say, "a causeless curse takes no effect" (Prov. xxvi. 2). He had taken the money, which was now charged with his mother's curses. With these he will not have it. "Here is your money back," he says; "I took it." As one shakes off rain, so he would free himself of this curse-laden money. "It is thy son," he says, "and his house, whom thou hast cursed. Take the money—I do not wish it." His words, so far as we can see, express more of reproach than of consciousness of guilt. And the mother resembles those people of whom James says (ch. iii. 10): "Out of the same mouth proceedeth blessing and cursing." She had cursed, in inconsiderate wrath, and without investigation, on account of her lost money. That being recovered, she will save her son from the effects of her malediction. As if blessing and curse were under human control, she exclaims: "Blessed be thou, my son, unto Jehovah."

The son was in any case wrong in taking the money secretly. The purpose for which he took it, seems to be indicated by the context and the speech of the mother. He wished it for the purpose which he afterwards carried out. This also explains sufficiently why he took it secretly: he probably did not believe that his mother would approve his design. For the preparation of pesel and masekah, an image and cast-work, for the purpose he had in view, was itself a theft, notwithstanding that it looked like an act of service to God. But it turned out differently. It was natural that his mother should ask for what purpose he had taken it; and he replies that he had destined it for Jehovah, to fit out a private sanctuary with an image and cast-work. The mother, in order to appease him, says: then do I consecrate it for Jehovah, from my hand for my son (the formula of dedication), that he may make an "image and cast-work";<sup>2</sup> now therefore take the money. Hereupon there arises a genuine contest of superstition. He is now afraid of the curse-laden money. And she is in dread lest the frustration of the seemingly religious end for which her son intended to use it, should fall back upon herself. He has excused his theft with the word "Jehovah;" and she seeks to cover up her curse with it. Superstition thus shows itself to be the worst profanation, transmuting eternal truth into subjective personal interest.

Ver. 4. And his mother took two hundred shekels of silver. Micah had once more refused the money. He still fears the curse that it may bring with it. Thereupon the mother causes the "image and cast-work" to be made; applying, however, not 1,100 shekels, but only 200. This shows that it was only avarice, and not the fact that she had dedicated the money to religious purposes, that had inspired her curse. For even now she cannot part with more than 200 shekels out of the 1,100. On the other hand, it becomes evident that the purpose for which Micah took the money was the manufacture of the image; for it is set up "in his house," and he combines with it still other operations.

Ver. 5. And he set up an ephod and teraphim. These words give the key to the whole transaction, and even afford a clew to the time in which it took place. The paternal house of Micah, it appears, had not openly broken with the service of Jehovah. This is clear from both his and his mother's words (vers. 2, 3, 13). But their hearts

1 The priest who subsequently entered the service of Micah, was named "Jonathan," i. e., Theodore. See at ch. xviii. 30.

2 Bertheau assumes that the mother devoted the money to this purpose, inasmuch as her son had already a Beth Elohim. But it was only the image that could make any house a "House of God." It is certainly more natural to suppose that, when he utterly refused to accept the money, she took it upon herself to provide the image with the money in question, in order to deliver him from the curse. She can have come to this use of the money, only because he gave it as the object for which he took it. The mother applies only two hundred shekels; the opinion that the others were used by way of endowment is at least not indicated in the text.

were not wholly with God. This is evident from her avarice and malediction. Theirs was not a house in which the Canaanitish Baal was sacrificed to; but neither was it one in which there was more of true religion than the form and name. In the house of Joash there stood, before Gideon destroyed it, an altar of Baal and an Asherah. That was not the case here. But selfishness and superstitious egoism are idolatrous in their nature and consequences, even when Jehovah, that is, the God of Israel, is still spoken of. What R. Juda Hallevi<sup>1</sup> says of Micah and others, applies especially to him: "He resembles a man who, while incestuously marrying his sister, should strictly observe the customary laws of marriage." He makes use of the name of God, but for that which is vanity (נִפְסָה, Ex. xx. 7). "He made an ephod." The sin of which he was thus guilty, lay not in the ephod, but in the fact that he set it up. The ephod was designed for the lawful priesthood. The Urim and Thummim were intended for Israel's high-priests (Ex. xxviii. 30), in order that by means of them they might be the constant organ of objective divine wisdom for the whole people, at the place where they served before God. Hence, they neither could nor ought to serve the subjective interests of individual men or tribes, or be inquired of anywhere else than where the priest was who bore them on his heart. This fact also renders the meaning of Judg. viii. 27 clear, where it is related that after Gideon had set up an ephod with the golden booty obtained from the Midianites, all Israel went a-whoring after it, and found a snare in it. Gideon, it is true, served Jehovah sincerely and truly, and meant only that his ephod should serve as a reminder to the people of the wonderful deeds of God; but in setting it up, he nevertheless introduced a precedent which subjective superstition misused to its own hurt. For, inasmuch as he set it up in his own house, he gave occasion for others to think that they also might do the same in their houses. The deeds in consequence of which he instituted the ephod were soon lost sight of; and the eye was directed only to the money out of which it proceeded. It may be assumed that precisely for Micah Gideon's example proved a source of danger, — for which, however, the blame falls not on the hero, but on Micah. We thus obtain a clew to the time in which the event here related occurred. Micah was a man of Ephraim who lived not long after the days of Gideon. There was pride enough in Ephraim to arrogate to itself the right of doing what was done, however grandly and nobly, in the smaller tribe of Manasseh. It is at all times the practice of paltry selfishness to dishonor the extraordinary actions of great men, by using them as cloaks for their own mean ends. Gideon destroyed the altar of Baal secretly, and for this purpose made use of his father's people and means without his father's knowledge. Micah probably excused himself by this example, when he secretly took his mother's money, in order to set up that which in his own interest he destined for God.

The anarchy of arbitrary individualism exhibits itself very strikingly here, in the fact that a mere common man (אִישׁ אֶחָד, ver. 1), without name or merit, has the presumption to do the same thing which Gideon, the Judge and Deliverer of Israel, had undertaken to do; and that he does it on the same mountains of Ephraim on which, at no great distance, in Shiloh, the ark of God and the lawful ephod were to be found. R. Nathan<sup>2</sup> thinks that the places were so near to each other, that the smoke from both sanctuaries might commingle, as it rose upward. A mere common man, who had nothing but money, presumed to found a sanctuary, with an ephod and a priest, and to pass this off as an oracle of Jehovah. The object he had in view can hardly have been any other than to ensnare the people who, in the pressure of their religious needs, sought for instruction, and brought votive offerings and gifts. For this purpose, the house which he founded must have been assimilated to the tabernacle; yet not so completely as to be attractive only to the thoroughly pious worshippers of Jehovah. For as these would not under any circumstances visit any sanctuary but that at Shiloh, Micah's house would then have failed of its purpose. It could be made attractive only by making it minister to the superstition of sensual worship, and by vesting this ministry in the forms of the service of Jehovah. Hence he speaks of consecration to Jehovah, but at the same time represents the latter by means of פָּסֶל וּמִסְכָּה (an image and cast-work). He set up an ephod, and supplemented it with teraphim. He needed a priest; and in the absence of a Levite, he himself selects one of his sons for the office. Every part of his proceeding is thus marked by subjective arbitrariness, which under pious names concealed self-interest and superstition. The narrator strikingly points out this his sin, by means of a few delicate strokes. Hitherto the man had always been called Micayehu, distinctly bearing the name of Jehovah. But from ver. 5, where he sets up his sanctuary, onward, he is only spoken of as Micah. The name of God was not to be desecrated in him. And although Micah speaks of "Jehovah" (v. 13), his house is only called a Beth Elohim, — a name also given to the temples of heathen deities, — not Beth Jehovah, house of Jehovah. No description is given of what the goldsmith shaped out of the mother's two hundred pieces of money; but it is called פָּסֶל וּמִסְכָּה, an image and cast-work. These words at the same time pronounce judgment against the sin that had been committed, for they are the technical expressions under which the law forbids the making of every kind of image-work for idolatrous purposes. The narrator has his eye doubtless on Deut. xxvii. 15: "Cursed (אָרֹר) is the man that maketh פָּסֶל וּמִסְכָּה, an abomination unto Jehovah, the work of the hands of the artificer." He intimates, assuredly, that the same man who stood in such dread of his mother's curse on the thief of her money, rendered himself obnoxious to the more awful curse of the divine law, when he desired, or at any rate accepted, such image-work. The form of the image cannot, however, be determined with certainty. The opinion that it represented a calf, is certainly not tenable. It is not true that Jehovah, the God of Israel, was ever or anywhere represented under

<sup>2</sup> The Talmud, Sanhedrin, 108 b, calls the name of the place where Micah lived, בֵּרֶב, and puts it at a distance of three מֵיל from Shiloh. So far as the name is concerned, it appears to be only a name of reproach, with a reference to Deut. xxviii. 27; Lev. xxi. 20. In Psachim 117 a, the place seems to be named בְּכִי (Bechi, ploration), probably in pursuance of a similar homiletical explanation.

the figure of a bull or calf. On the contrary, this figure was symbolical of a contrast, a national and historical contrast, with Jehovah. This appears both from the golden calf of the desert and from the history of Jeroboam.<sup>1</sup> To infer from the analogy of the latter, that Micah also cast a calf, would likewise be erroneous. For Micah's act has no national, but only a religious significance. He does not intend to set up a contrast to Jehovah, but only a superstitious syncretism with other sanctuaries. Had the image been a calf, the narrator would have taken occasion to say so; for that of itself, in its relation to the idolatry of the desert, would have indicated the nature of Micah's sin. Since it must be assumed that Micah intended to establish a sort of tabernacle, it is to be supposed that in his image-work also he carried out this imitation to the extreme of superstition.

In the tabernacle, on the כִּסֵּא רַחֲמִים ["mercy-seat"] there were two cherubim, with outspread wings; and in Ex. xxv. 22, God says: "I will speak with thee from upon the kapporeth [mercy-seat], from between the two cherubim." Now, if Micah, while in general imitating this arrangement, transformed the cherubim into sphinx-like figures, such as were found in Egyptian temples, and symbolized (as Clem. Alex., Strom. lib. v. ch. 5, well explains.) the mysterious problems concerning the Deity, which received their solution at the hands of the priests, he would at the same time minister to the superstition of the time. And it was especially the establishment of an oracle that Micah had in view. The verb פָּצַל means to cut, to chisel, especially in wood, to carve; for the image, פָּצַל, can be burnt (Deut. vii. 5, 25), or sawed in pieces (Deut. xii. 3). פָּצַל is the coating of gold with which the image was covered (cf. Ewald, Altorthümer, p. 256, 2d edit.), and is therefore often mentioned in connection with pesel, but frequently also without it. Such wooden images (called éḡava, by the Greeks), says K. O. Müller (Archäologie, § 69), were adorned with chaplets and diadems, neck-chains, and ear-pendants. To this the lawgiver refers, when he says (Deut. vii. 25): "The images of their gods ye shall burn with fire; thou shalt not desire the silver or gold that is on them." Beside the ephod Micah also made teraphim. This addition shows that he designed the ephod for divining purposes. The subject of the teraphim has hitherto remained enveloped in a great deal of obscurity. From Ezek. xxi. 26 (21), 2 Kgs. xxiii. 24, and Hos. iii. 4, (cf. also 1 Sam. xv. 23), it is certain that they were consulted, like oracles. They were shaped like human beings, see 1 Sam. xix. 13; and they were small, otherwise Rachel could not have concealed them (Gen. xxxi. 34). Antiquity conceived of every thing connected with divination as wrapped in darkness and mystery. The heathen oracle issued out of the depth and darkness in enigmatic language.

<sup>1</sup> Cf. my treatise, Jeroboam, Erf. 1856. Unfortunately, Keil also thinks that this opinion is "scarcely to be doubted," although he adduces no grounds for it. For that the term פָּצַל, in Ex. xxxii. 4, is also followed by

פָּצַל, is as natural as it is that this latter word is always found whenever cast images are spoken of. Cf. Ex. xxxiv. 17. The error is so widespread that it has even found a place in the reply of Thomas (Union, Kath. Kirche, p. 40), to Stahl's book on "Union." [On this question of the

At Megara, there was an oracle of the goddess Night, represented as a high and closely veiled figure. The little teraphim also must have borne about them tokens of their mysterious nature. We may venture to recognize them in the little shapes of Greek art, enveloped in a thick mantle and hat, who constantly accompany the figures of Æsculapius, the divining god of the healing art (where also the tablets usually appear, symbolic of the responses of the god. Müller, Archäol., § 394, 1). Among the various names given to these attendant figures by the Greeks, is that of Telephoros, end-bringing.<sup>2</sup> It is well known that oracles were most frequently consulted with reference to physical ailments. In Israel, also, in days of apostasy, idols were applied to for healing (2 Kgs. i. 2). The teraphim, accordingly, appear to represent oracles of healing. Their name, at all events, teraphim (trophim), approximates closely to that of Trophonius,<sup>3</sup> for which also the Greek language affords no suitable etymology. Trophonius is the healing oracle, who delivered his responses in a dark chasm, and who, like Æsculapius, is represented with a serpent, from which he probably derived his name (cf. פִּתְוִן). The relationship of teraphim and "seraphim" is plain enough. The serpent-divination of Greece is manifestly of Asiatic origin. That the Israelites offered incense to the healing serpent erected by Moses, we learn from the history of Hezekiah, who destroyed it (2 Kgs. xviii. 4). The teraphim, then, explain themselves and some other matters, when we regard them as Telephoroi, possessed of oracular healing attributes. Every passage in which they appear is in this way fully explained.

Ver. 6. In those days there was no king in Israel. There was no central civil authority, that could interpose against sin and its seductive arts. The sentence teaches that in Israel it was considered the office of the king, not to allow such arbitrariness and sin as those of Micah to assert themselves. It was regarded as a mark of anarchy, when, alongside of the sanctuary at Shiloh, a common man took it upon himself to seduce the people into superstition. It must, however, be said, that even though the worship of God in Shiloh was strong enough to face such dangers, it is nevertheless presumptively a sign of weakness in the contemporary ministers of that worship, that Micah had the courage to do as he did. The complaint of our verse is made, because in reality Micah sinned against the very foundations of the Mosaic faith and law. It is not the freedom which permitted a man to have a chapel of his own, that is lamented; but the license which enabled him to fit out an idol-temple, to establish an oracle, and arbitrarily to disfigure the genuine national cultus. For the rest, the utterance is one that could be made only when the kingly office was either expected to exhibit or had exhibited, its efficiency in protecting the law in its purity. It was possible only until the most flourishing point of Solomon's meaning of calf-idols in Israel, cf. Smith's Bible Dictionary, art. "Calf." — Ta.]

<sup>2</sup> It is only by the gift of foretelling limit and end, from amid concealment and mystery, that the nature and symbol of the Telephoroi can be explained; and only thus far can a connection between them and the sages of telephoria, of which Böckh speaks, be allowed. It is only their connection with the teraphim that explains both these and them. This fact escaped both Preller (Griech. Myth., i. 237) and Welcker (Griech. Myth., ii. 740).

Vers. 7-12. And there was a Levite. Micah probably found that his sanctuary lacked consideration, because it had no priest. There were priests enough in Ephraim, to be sure; but it would seem that none of them were willing to serve him—which redounds to their honor. Assistance came to him, however, from another quarter. A young man, who according to rule was settled in Judah (יְהוּדָה: מִשְׁפַּחַת יְהוֹנָדָה, cf. Josh. xxi. 4), became discontented at home, and took to travelling about, after the manner of a scholar in the Middle Ages. He stopped some time in Bethlehem, but left that place also; and on his way over the mountains of Ephraim, he came to Micah. The position of Micah's sanctuary must have been a favorable one, near the high-ways from south to north; for the Danites, who came from Eshtaol and Zorah, and the young Levite, who came from Bethlehem, passed by it. Micah, hearing that the Levite was unengaged, proposed to him to take service with himself. The proposition was made sufficiently inviting. The young man was to be honored as "a father" (אָב, pater), become a priest, and be placed in good circumstances. Vanity, and the offer of a good place led the young Levite astray,—and he was not the last who fell thus. He forgot who he was (see at ch. xviii. 30), and whom as Levite he ought to serve, and consented (וְיָצָא, cf. on ch. i. 27). Micah took him in with great joy; so that, even beyond his promises, he received him as "one of his sons,"—an expression which stands in suggestive contrast with Micah's promise to regard him "as a father." For the sake of money, the Levite submitted to be "consecrated, ordained," by an Ephraimite. (The words מִשְׁכֵּן אֱפְרַיִם are a standing expression for to induct, to ordain. The expression is derived (as Ex. xxix. 33 compared with ver. 24 clearly shows), from the ceremony of laying the offerings required at the consecration of a priest upon his hands, עָלַי, Ex. xxix. 24). At all events, Micah valued the Levitical dignity more highly than the Levite himself did. When the latter had entered his house, he exclaimed:—

Ver. 13. Now know I that Jehovah will do me good, seeing the Levite has become my priest. These words indicate most strikingly, the thorough self-deception of the man. He looks for blessings to Jehovah, against whom he has committed the mortal sin of image-worship. He expects these blessings on account of a Levite, who did wrong when he allowed himself to be hired. He who sets up ephod and teraphim for the enlightenment of others, has himself so little insight into the spirit of truth as not to perceive that in the falsehood of his entire establishment its downfall is already assured. Perhaps, he also found pleasure in the descent of his Levite (ch. xviii. 30), although it ought rather to have frightened him. But self-love blinds him, and his soiled conscience builds hopes on the name of a Levite, whose doings in his house challenged the judgments of God. "Now know I," he exclaims. He will soon learn how deceptive this knowing is.

The tribe of Dan, desirous of more room, despatches explorers. These, after spending a night near Micah's religious establishment, become aware of its existence, and consult its oracle. Proceeding, they find at Laish an inviting place, easy of conquest. They return home, and a colony of six hundred families is sent out.

CHAPTER XVIII. 1-13.

- 1 In those days there was no king in Israel: and in those days the tribe of the Danites sought them an inheritance to dwell in; for unto that day all their [no] inheritance<sup>1</sup> had not [omit: not] fallen unto them among the tribes of Israel.
- 2 And the children [sons] of Dan sent of their family five men from their coasts [of their whole number], men of valour, from Zorah, and from Eshtaol, to spy out the land, and to search it; and they said unto them, Go, search the land: who when [and] they came to mount Ephraim, to [as far as] the house of Micah, [and] they
- 3 lodged there. When they were by the house of Micah, they knew the voice<sup>2</sup> of the young man the Levite: and they turned in thither, and said unto him, Who brought thee hither? and what makest [doest] thou in this place? and what hast
- 4 thou here? And he said unto them, Thus and thus dealeth Micah with me, and
- 5 hath [he] hired me, and I am [became] his priest. And they said unto him, Ask counsel, we pray thee, of God, that we may know whether our way which we go
- 6 shall be prosperous. And the priest said unto them, Go in peace: before the Lord
- 7 [Jehovah] is your way wherein ye go. Then the five men departed, and came to Laish, and saw the people that were therein, how they dwelt<sup>3</sup> carelessly [securely], after the manner of the Zidonians, quiet and secure; and there was no magistrate [potentate] in the land, that might put them to shame [injure them] in any thing; and they were far from the Zidonians, and had no business with any man [had no intercourse with other men]. And they came unto their brethren to Zorah and Eshtaol: and their brethren said unto them, What say ye? And they said, Arise, that we may [and let us] go up against them: for we have seen the land, and behold, it is very good: and are ye still? be not slothful to go, and to enter [come] to possess the land. When ye go, ye shall come unto a people secure, and to a large land: for God hath given it into your hands; a place where there is no want of any thing that is in the earth [land]. And there went from thence of the family of the Danites, out of Zorah and out of Eshtaol, six hundred men appointed [girded] with weapons of war. And they went up, and pitched [encamped] in Kirjath-jearim, in Judah: wherefore they called [call] that place Mahaneh-dan [Camp of Dan] unto this day: behold, it is behind Kirjath-jearim. And they passed thence unto mount Ephraim, and came unto [as far as] the house of Micah.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 1. — בְּיָמָיו properly means: "in the character of an inheritance, as an inheritance," cf. Num. xxvi. 58, etc. The nominative to לְיִרְמְיָהוּ is to be supplied from the thought of the preceding clause, either in the form of בְּיָמָיו, or, better, in the more general form of יָמָיו, land. The writer probably intended to introduce the subject after the verb, but as he proceeded his attention was diverted by subordinate clauses, and so he ended with an anacoluthon. — Tr.]

[2 Ver. 8. — קָוָה Dr. Cassel renders "saw," see his explanation below. Keil and others understand it of dialectic pronunciation or other peculiarities of speech. Bertheau thinks that inasmuch as the envoys had to "turn aside" from their way in order to get to Micah's temple, they could not have been near enough to hear the Levite's voice or note his pronunciation. He therefore assumes that what they recognized was the "tidings" that were told them of the sanctuary near by. But why not take the words in the sense in which any man would naturally take them at the first reading? The Levite had been a wanderer; some one (or more) of the five envoys had met with him, and now recognizes his voice, as they lie encamped near by. The conversation that ensues when they meet with him is certainly exactly such as would be expected under such circumstances; and the account which Micah gives of his personal affairs (ver. 4), can scarcely be explained on any other supposition. — Tr.]

[3 Ver. 7. — יִשְׂרָאֵל is predicate to יִשְׂרָאֵלִים, and as such ought to be masculine. The feminine is accounted for on the principle that the writer's imagination identifies the people with the city in which they live, and so speaks of them as feminine, cf. Ewald, Lehrb. 174 b; Green, Gram. 375, 2, b. The appositional masculine participles שָׁמְרוּ וַיִּבְנוּ only show that this identification is no longer in the mind of the writer. — Tr.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Ver. 1. In those days there was no king in Israel. This is repeated in order to intimate that the author does not approve of what he is about to relate concerning the Danites. Such a piratical expedition was possible only when there was no organic national authority to guard the public peace and watch over the enforcement of law. The kingly office is a guaranty of the safety of property and of the continuance of public peace, and does not permit adventurous expeditions, undertaken for the injury of others. These very evils, however, were prevalent in Germany, notwithstanding imperial rule; and that not only in the Middle Ages. It was a matter of great difficulty, in the fourteenth century, to bring about the formation of local peace-compacts; and even then they had inserted in them the clause of the Westphalian treaty of 1371, according to which a city or lord was only forbidden to engage in hostilities without a previous declaration of war. Even this principle would have condemned the Danites, it is true, but the organic government in the interests of peace and order which Israel understood by מְלָכֻת, kingdom, royal dominion, had no existence in Germany, even until after the thirty years' war.

For that unto that day no inheritance had fallen unto them. These words do not express the view of the narrator, but rehearse the complaint of the Danites, which was causeless however. Dan had certainly received an inheritance; and in proof of it is the fact that even at this time the tribe dwelt in the district of Zorah and Eshtaol. Its territory extended over Timnah and Ekron, as far as Joppa on the coast (Josh. xix. 41-46); but it had been crowded into the mountains by the Amorites (Judg. i. 34), and had failed to dispossess the Philistines of the plain along the sea-coast. On this account the tribe might indeed have too narrow bounds; but instead of enlarging their borders by making war on their heathen neighbors, they complained. If they had not been lacking in the true enthusiasm of faith in Jehovah, their onsets of irresistible prowess would not have failed to win the territory allotted to them. But it was easier, it must be allowed, to surprise undefended houses and lands, than to contend with the five princes of the Philistines, and their numerous armies. The words before us are only the subterfuge with which Dan defended the unusual resolution it had taken before the other tribes.

Ver. 2. And the sons of Dan sent of their family five men. Only in Israel was it an unusual thing to look about for other possessions than those which had been assigned. Among other nations, the reduction of a too numerous population by means of colonization, was a matter of frequent occurrence (cf. Movers, Phönizier, iii. 3, etc.). In the case of Dan, however, the resolution to look about for new territory was not arrived at by a few adventurers, who unceremoniously cut themselves loose from their people, but by the whole community. The commissioners and envoys to whom the promotion of the scheme was entrusted, were elected from among the whole (מִקְצוֹתָם) and were not ordinary spies, but chosen men (אֲנָשֵׁי חָכְמָה), upon whom the matter naturally devolved. (Compare the Roman plan of appointing commissioners to supervise the establishment of a colony.) The express statement that they were told "Go, explore the land," is added, in order to relieve them from every appearance of having acted only on their own responsibility.

Vers. 3, 4. There, near the house of Micah, they recognized the sound. "There" (שָׁם), i. e., in the vicinity of the "temple-house," which is here, in a special sense, called the "house of Micah."

When they were near this house (עַם-בֵּית), they heard the "sound" (קוֹל) of the young Levite. This has been curiously enough understood of the voice of the Levite. But how could the Danites tell by the voice that it belonged to a Levite? The statement, however, becomes instructive, when we call to mind what is written in Ex. xxviii. 35. The Levite in Micah's House wore the priestly dress, which was provided with bells, in order "that their sound may be heard (קוֹלֵם) when he enters into and comes out of the Holy Place."

The Danites, having passed the night (לַיְלָה), heard, in the morning, the bells of the officiating priest, and thus learned, to their astonishment, that there was a Levite there.

Vers. 5, 6. Inquire, we pray thee, of God (Elohim). The Danites, it is evident from all they do, are not steadfast in their faith in Jehovah. Hence, also, they find no fault with the Levite for having "hired" himself to Micah; nor do they hesitate, when they learn that he has an ephod and teraphim (ver. 14), to consult his oracle about the success of their undertaking; but that Jehovah was worshipped here, did not appear to them to be the case. The narrator indicates this very delicately, by making them say, "Inquire of Elohim," although the Levite, in the account he gave of himself, had used the name Jehovah, for to his service Micah's House was nominally devoted. The Levite's response is oracular, i. e., thoroughly ambiguous: "Go in peace: יֵהוּדָה דִּרְבָּכָם נָכָח." נָכָח is simply equivalent to coram; no such accessory idea as "favorable," lies in the words. "Your way is before Jehovah" — an answer unquestionably correct. The Danites probably explained it in a favorable sense, on account of the "go in peace" which preceded it.

Ver. 7. And the five went, and came to Laish. Since the city was afterwards called Dan, whose name and situation at one of the sources of the Jordan (and that not the spring at Baniās), was known in the time of Josephus, Robinson was doubtless right in saying (B., R. iii. 392), that "of the identity of its situation and that of Tell el-Kady there can be no question." Ritter (xv. 217) even communicates Wilson's observation, according to which the name Dan, i. e., judge, survives by translation in Kady, the surname of the Tell Laish, however, lay "in the valley that leads to Beth-rehob" (ver. 28). This valley can scarcely be any other than the present Wady et-Teim, the great longitudinal valley which extends from the plain of Lake Hüleh upward to Rasheiya. Through this valley and the Buka'a runs the direct road from the sources of the Jordan to Hamath (Rob. iii. 371). The spies of Moses explored the land as far as Rehob, where the road leads to Hamath (Num. xiii. 21). Rehob (prop. Rechob) is a name suggested by topographical characteristics, and recurs therefore in various places. It always presupposes the presence of a plain or level surface.<sup>2</sup> It is to be noted that Scripture itself does not speak of either Dan or Laish, as situated at the sources of the Jordan. We may, nevertheless, venture the conjecture that this situation may be found indicated in the name Laish (לַיִשׁ). Laish signifies a lion; and ancient, originally Egyptian, symbology, has made the lion the sign of flowing stream-sources. For as soon as the sun enters his sign in the zodiac, the sources of the Nile begin to rise. Hence, says Horapollo, the mouths of fountains are provided with the figures of lions. This also accounts for the statement of Pollux, that the lion is called κρηνοφύλαξ, "guardian of springs," and for the wide-extended usage of setting up figures of the lion near springs. The place of the source of the Orontes is named Lebweh, which also means lion. The river which rises near Baalbek-Heliopolis was called Leontes (at present Litány); and the lion himself, as Egyptian symbol, signified "House of the Sun." On the front-side of a building over the spring of Ain 'Anûb there are found figures of animals, considered to be either lions or dogs (Ritter, xvii. 676). The name Laish may be supposed to indicate in a similar manner the fountain, "one of the largest in the world," which leaps down in an "immense stream" from Tell el-Kady (Rob. iii. 390). We are reminded by it of the blessing of Moses (Deut. xxxiii. 22): "And of Dan he said, Dan is a לַיִשׁ רֶמֶס (lion's whelp); he leaps forth from Bashan." The attribute thus expressed corresponds, as it were, to that indicated in the name Laish. Leshem, the name under which the place appears in Josh. xix. 47, gives literal expression, perhaps, to the same idea which was figuratively indicated by Laish. The verb לָשַׁע, to break through (of a spring), to flow, belongs to an ancient and widely diffused root. Hence, as the source of the Jordan was called לַיִשׁ, so the warm springs near the Dead Sea were called לֶשָׁה, Leshah, changed afterwards into Callirrhoe (cf. lethan, Licus, Lech, Celtic, Leis, Lias, and numerous similar river names).

Ver. 7. There was no hereditary potentate in the land, to oppress them in any respect. The observations of the five envoys are remarkable. They find the city, as a colony of Sidon, quietly devoted to industrial arts, after the manner of the mother city. It had not entered into relations for mutual protection with other cities, probably on the ground of its being a colony. That notwithstanding this, it could feel itself secure, and live without much warlike vigilance, although Sidon was so far away, evinces the very peaceful condition of the Syria of that day. The envoys observe also, that "there is no יָרֵשׁ עָצָר in the land." The expression is obscure by reason of its uncommonness. It seems to me, that it can only be understood in this way: The Danite envoys, during their stay in Laish, investigate particularly the ability of the city to defend itself. In this investigation they find not only that the people are engaged in peaceful industry (שָׁמְנוּ), while their natural allies are far away, but also that there is no יָרֵשׁ עָצָר, i. e., no dynast or tyrant, in the land, with armed troops in his pay, ready for war. The presence of such a one would make it necessary to anticipate serious and ready resistance. Hence, the Persians, when they took possession of Ionia, deposed the tyrants and instituted popular governments everywhere (Herod. vi. 43).

1 [Our author, both in his version of the Hebrew text and here, transfers לַיִשׁ from the end of one verse to the beginning of another, but without good reason. — Tr.]

Under the יָרֵשׁ עָצָר of our passage, we are to understand what the Greeks called dynasts, hereditary despots, who exercised supreme control in the city. There is no thought here of a king or of suffetes, but of a tyrannical oppressor, who without consent of the inhabitants has become their master, and who surrounds himself with armed troops, in order, as instances in both Greek and Phœnician islands and cities sufficiently prove, to preserve the succession to this sort of government in his own family by means of force. In this explanation, עָצָר may either be taken as the object after יָרֵשׁ, in the sense of enforced supremacy, — in which case 1 Sam. ix. 17 may be compared, for עָצָר is indeed, both in letter and sense, the Latin arcere, and sometimes also equivalent to coercere; or it may be regarded as standing in subjective opposition to יָרֵשׁ, and be compared with עָצָר

= אֶצֶר, lord, commander (cf. the Sanskrit cira), in the Aramaic names Nebuchadnezzar and Esarhaddon (cf. my Ortsnamen, i. 118). Since such a Jorah-eler wields his power by violence and without the consent of his subjects, it is not said that none such "reigns" in the land, but אֶצֶר מְכַלִּים, none such "injures, oppresses."<sup>1</sup> But for defense against attacks from without, such a ruler is undoubtedly well adapted, as may be seen in the instance of Polycrates. The envoys, therefore, are right, when they consider the absence of such a commander, where powerful friends are far away, and military activity is altogether wanting, as favorable to the success of an assailant.

Vers. 8-10. And they said, Arise, and let us go up against them. The narrative allows ancient manners to speak for themselves in a very delicate way. The five envoys, on their arrival at home, keep quiet, until they are asked, What have ye? Then, however, they are the ones who stimulate the irresolute and doubtful: "why are you silent? be not slothful לִבְנָה, לִבְנָה, לִבְנָה," for to go, to come, and to have what you desire, is one and the same thing. You will find an attractive country without defense, a large land, to which nothing (either of wealth or attractiveness) is wanting. This representation was not extravagant. Laish was situated in the valley, perhaps on the same spot afterwards occupied by the Daphne mentioned by Josephus; which name, in the Hellenistic period, was only given to attractively situated places. Accordingly, Josephus himself also speaks of his Daphne as a delicious place, rich in water-springs (Wars, iv. 1, 1). The tract of land in which it lay, is still called Ard Difneh, and is covered with glorious wheat-fields and noble old trees (Rob. iii. 394). The emigrating Messenians were in similar manner invited by Anaxilaus of Rhegium to make themselves masters of Zankle in Sicily, being told that it was a blessed land, and in a fine part of the island (Paus. iv. 23). Seneca remarks (Consolatio ad Helviam matrem, cap. vi.), that many emigrants have been deceived by unmeasured praises of the fertile territory.

The envoys, in order to strengthen their people, add that "Elohim has given the land into their hands," referring probably to the response of the Levite's oracle.

Ver. 11. And there broke up from thence six hundred men, girded with weapons of war. Six hundred families either volunteered, or were selected. The number may correspond with ancient usage. Livy relates that the Romans, when engaged in a colonizing enterprise, in the year 197 before Christ, sent out three hundred families into each several city (xxxii. 29). The Danites, like Greek and Roman colonies, set out as if for war, with banners, arms, and means of subsistence (ver. 21). In a speech of Demosthenes it is said: Ἐλάμβανον πεμπόμενοι ὄπλα ἐκ τοῦ δημοῦ καὶ ἐφόδια (cf. Hermann, Griech. Staatsalterthümer, § 75, 2).

Ver. 12. Wherefore that place is called "Camp of Dan," unto this day: behold, it is behind Kirjath-jearim. The expedition was at that time an extraordinary event. It seemed to renew the old marches of Israel in the desert, for the conquest of Canaan. There doubtless existed notices concerning the various stations which they made on the journey. It seems, however, that only three of the stations are known to us. The first was the "Machaneh Dan," with which the first awakening of Samson to his life of heroism was connected (ch. xiii. 25). It lay between Zorah and Eshtaol, and was therefore doubtless the place of rendezvous for the expedition, which came for the most part from those cities (ver. 11, cf. ver. 2). This cannot be the same with the Machaneh Dan near Kirjath-jearim, in the tribe of Judah, of which mention is here made. The researches of Robinson enable us to locate the latter near the modern Kuryet el-'Enab, whence the high road appears to have gone over the mountains of Ephraim. The third is the sanctuary of Micah, where likewise the "camping-place of Dan" was probably long remembered. At all events, the remark, that since this expedition the name Machaneh Dan existed, shows that the event took place before the days of Samson (during which Dan appears also to have been in an enfeebled condition), and is therefore to be put between Gideon and Samson.

<sup>1</sup> Keil's explanation of this passage is in all essential points very similar, except that he defines יָרֵשׁ עָצָר, as "one who seizes on power," and derives (rightly, no doubt) יָרֵשׁ from יָרַשׁ in the sense of seizing, and not as our author does, in the sense of "inheriting," or rather, perhaps, in both senses at the same time. — Ta.]

The Danites, on the way to Laish, pillage the sanctuary of Micah, and persuade his priest to go with them. Micah pursues, but finding the robbers too strong, turns back. The conquest and destruction of Laish, and the building of Dan.

CHAPTER XVIII. 14-31.

- 14 Then answered the five men that went to spy out the country of Laish, and said unto their brethren, Do ye know that there is in these houses an ephod, and teraphim, and a graven image, and a molten image? now therefore consider what ye 15 have to do. And they turned thitherward, and came to the house of the young man the Levite, even unto [omit: unto] the house of Micah, and saluted him.
 16 And the six hundred men appointed [girded] with their weapons of war, which 17 were of the children [sons] of Dan,<sup>1</sup> stood by the entering of the gate. And the five men that went to spy out the land went up, and came in thither [entered the "house"], and took the graven image, and the ephod, and the teraphim, and the molten image: and the priest stood in the entering of the gate with the six hundred men that were appointed [girded] with weapons of war. And these went [when these had gone] into Micah's house, and fetched the carved image, the ephod, and the teraphim, and the molten image. [...] Then [then] said the priest unto them, What do ye? And they said unto him, Hold thy peace, lay thine hand upon thy mouth, and go with us, and be to us a father and a priest: Is it better for thee to be a priest unto the house of one man, or that thou be a priest unto a 20 tribe and a family in Israel? And the priest's heart was glad, and he took the ephod, and the teraphim, and the graven image, and went in the midst of the 21 people. So they turned and departed, and put the little ones, and the cattle, and 22 the carriage [baggage] before them. And when they were a good way from the house of Micah,<sup>2</sup> the men that were in the houses near to Micah's house were 23 gathered together, and overtook the children [sons] of Dan. And they cried [called out] unto the children [sons] of Dan. And they turned their faces, and said unto Micah, What aileth [What is the matter with] thee, that thou comest
 24 with such a company? And he said, Ye have taken away my gods which I made, and the priest, and ye are gone away: and what have I more? and what is this 25 that ye say unto me, What aileth [is the matter with] thee? And the children [sons] of Dan said unto him, Let not thy voice be heard among us, lest angry fellows [men fierce of spirit] run [fall] upon thee, and thou lose [destroy] thy 26 life, with [and] the lives of thy household [house]. And the children [sons] of Dan went their way: and when [omit: when] Micah saw that they were too strong for him [stronger than he], [and] he turned and went back unto his house.
 27 And they took the things which Micah had made, and the priest which he had, and came unto [upon] Laish, unto [upon] a people that were at [omit: that were at] quiet and secure: and they smote them with the edge of the sword, and burnt the 28 city with fire. And there was no deliverer, because it [i. e., the city,] was far from Zidon, and they had no business with any man [i. e., no intercourse with other people]; and it [the city] was in the valley that lieth by [extends to] Beth-rehob. And they
 29 built a [the] city, and dwelt therein. And they called the name of the city Dan, after the name of Dan their father, who was born unto Israel: howbeit the name
 30 of the city was Laish at the first. And the children [sons] of Dan set up the graven image [for themselves]: and Jonathan, the son of Gershom, the son of Manasseh [Moses], he and his sons were priests to the tribe of Dan until the day
 31 of the captivity of the land.<sup>3</sup> And they set them up Micah's graven image which he made, all the time that the house of God was in Shiloh.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[<sup>1</sup> Ver. 16. — אֲנִי פָּדִי יָדָא. The unusual position of this clause, separated from the words to which it belongs, may be explained by supposing that at the end of the sentence it occurred to the author that his language might possibly be understood of six hundred men stationing themselves to guard the temple, and prohibit the approach of the Danites, and that he obviates this by adding the present clause. The E. V. places the words where according to the sense they belong. — Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Ver. 14. Do ye know that there is in these houses an ephod, teraphim, and image and cast-work? The five men who had reconnoitered Laish, accompany the colony, and form the soul of the whole undertaking. This is manifestly not conceived and carried out in the spirit of the God of Israel. The Danites present us with a military expedition, reckless and violent, such as the history of migrations and conquests is full of. Their road leads them over the mountains, and past the House of Micah. What houses are those? ask the Danites. And their guides inform them (יִצְטָק), for the question is only presupposed), that here there is a private sanctuary, fully provided with everything necessary to such an institution. No Roman colony was sent forth without the authority of taking auspices, or without an attendant pularius. The Danite envoys had asked the priest concerning the mind of Elohim, and had communicated his favorable answer to their brethren. The need of an oracle of their own becomes strongly felt by these warriors, who take the field from wholly subjective motives. The people have not left their hereditary lauded possessions in order to lose themselves in a strange land, but to preserve their tribe-consciousness. This consciousness was alive in them, however, only so far as its national character went. They remember Dan, their ancestor, but not Jehovah, their God. They were not unbelieving, but superstitious; and superstition is subjective. It desires to be helped by Elohim, but it has no penitence, so as to serve Jehovah. The Danites desire to have a deity of their own, to direct them by his responses; and think that they can steal him, as gold and property may be stolen. Before Jehovah they could not stand with the thoughts of robbery and death that fill their hearts; but in these houses, they hear, there is an image and cast-work, ephod and teraphim. They conclude to conquer for their future city its appropriate temple service also.

Vers. 15–20. And they came to the house of the young man the Levite, the house of Micah. The manner in which the robbery is accomplished is vividly and beautifully portrayed. The five leaders are, of course, acquainted with the Levite from their former visit. They were also acquainted with the situation. They go to him, and greet him. The priest recognizes them, and permits them, the five, to enter the sanctuary. He himself remains at the gate, where the six hundred, in their warlike array, have placed themselves, while the families, the cattle, and the rest of the train, are already moving off. The five, being alone in the temple, take all its treasures, image and image adornments, ephod and teraphim (another proof that the latter were small), and bring them forth (ver. 18), when the priest addresses them: "What do ye?" Even at this stage, the narrative does not conceal the lukewarmness of the priest. He was not watchful when the people came, sent no information of anything to Micah, and even now raised no alarm to prevent the theft which he could not but know was in progress. He was just an hireling. Hence, when the five propose to him to be priest to them, a whole tribe, rather than to a mere individual, but in that case to keep still, and come along with the idols, without making a noise, — he accepts the offer with joy, takes the idols into his priestly hands, and is for security inclosed in the midst of the warriors. What a strange thing is superstition! This priest has first of all betrayed his God and his office for money, has by his name as priest led many astray, and now, from mere vanity, abandons his benefactor, who has treated him as a son (ch. xvii. 11), and leaves him in the lurch; and yet he is eagerly snatched up as something valuable, and it is considered a great point gained when such hands as his carry gods who allow themselves to be taken off by robbers, and to be honored and praised by traitors. It is worthy of notice, that, according to ver. 20, the priest when he joins the warriors, regains custody only of the "ephod, teraphim, and image:" the mussekah, the ornament of the image, containing its gold value, the Danites do not trust out of their own hands.

Vers. 21–26. They had just departed from the house of Micah. The Danites show themselves well versed in the arts of freebooters. They assume that they may be pursued. Accordingly, they cause everything that cannot defend itself or is difficult of transportation, to proceed in advance of them. (The term כִּבְדָּה, from כָּבַד, heavy, must here undoubtedly be taken of what, like cattle, admits of only slow transportation;<sup>1</sup> for many valuables the Danites can scarcely have had with them. Moreover — and this is important here — the meaning "valuable," in this word, is only a derivative one from "heavy.") Thus they march along — behind their children, sheep, and beasts of burden — ready for instant action. Meanwhile, information of the theft had reached Micah. About his sanctuary a little village had formed itself. The people are quickly collected. They pursue. But there was no Abraham here, who with three hundred and eighteen men smote great armies. Neither Abraham's faith, nor Abraham's good cause were here. The Danites, when they hear the outcries of the pursuers, act at first as if nothing had happened. But when by Micah's anger they perceive that he knows all, they — probably the five leaders — tell him that it were better for him to be quiet — he might otherwise lose more; for the people there, whom he sees, are fierce of disposition, and know no mercy. And Micah was obliged to yield to superior power. The narrative shows strikingly how men, when excited about their property, show their true faces. Micah, who has always talked of Jehovah, as he who did him good, now, forgetting himself entirely, calls out to the Danites: "Ye have taken the gods which I made." For, of course, only "gods" can be taken away, not Jehovah; and his right to them, is based on the fact that he made them. Strictly speaking, he cannot complain. He had taken, and others have taken from him. He had committed treason, and he has been forsaken. He sees now what sort of fortune the priest and idolatry brought him. That which Micah had set up to lead others astray, became the occasion in consequence of which he was robbed. He carried sorrow back with him into his house; his return was desolate, — without gold, but with the judgment of his conscience. If he was led thereby to repentance, we may be sure that he soon found the Eternal God again, who pardons sinners, even though they have fallen seven and seventy times.

Vers. 27-29. And they called the name of the city Dan. As the Messenians changed the name of the city Zankle into Messene, so the Joktanides, who migrated from Yemen into Central Arabia, gave their tribe name to the possessions they conquered, as is proved by the kingdom of the Ghas-sanides on the borders of Syria (cf. Ritter, xii. 86). It has been the general and constantly recurring usage of all migrating nations. The strange country was embellished with homelike names. It was the opinion of ancient thinkers, that, as Seneca wrote to his mother, the best consolation in exile and emigration was to take along what one had been accustomed to (natura communis), as also one's peculiar gift (propria virtus). The Danites did this. They held their ground in the new Dan, whose fame had wholly eclipsed that of the old home, had not Samson subsequently arisen in Zorah. But though the new Dan never overshadowed the old, the name certainly took firm root in the North, and in the expression "from Dan to Beer-sheba," indicated the northern extremity of the actual possessions of the twelve tribes, although the Mosaic boundaries, and sometimes (as under David) even temporary occupation, extended beyond this point.

Nevertheless, whenever the history of Israel was rightly apprehended, in its properly spiritual character, the usurpation of Laish was never approved or justified. It was an arbitrary breaking in upon the given order, and upon the claims of another tribe; for the new Dan settled itself in districts which formed part of the original territories of the Northern tribes, particularly of Naphtali (who, it is true, had also failed to drive out the inhabitants of Beth-anath, i. e., Paneas, cf. ch. i. 33). The new possession was associated with no other memories than such as conflicted with the true service of God: it was dedicated with the idolatrous image of Micah, and it was destroyed with the Calf of Jeroboam.<sup>1</sup> The usurpation, it should be carefully observed, proceeded not from individuals, but from the common will of the whole tribe. The division of Manasseh was contemplated in the plan of the lawgiver; but the self-division of Dan was a sin against the organic constitution of the nation. Hence, when the emigrants, who speak of themselves as a "tribe" and "family" in Israel (ver. 19), succeed in grafting the tribe name, Dan,<sup>2</sup> on the conquered territory, although the larger part of the tribe remained behind, the result is, that, after the career of Samson, the name became wholly lost from its old home. Even in Samson's day, the Danites, as such, are no longer spoken of. The tribe Judah already attracts everything to itself. The very remembrance of the families of Dan perished, for which reason we find no lists of them in the Books of Chronicles, while the families of Simeon, whose possessions were also inclosed by those of Judah, are nevertheless duly enumerated (1 Chron. iv. 24 ff.). By appropriating to himself that which did not belong to him, Dan lost even that which he had. It is on such spiritual grounds as these, that among the twelve tribes of the Apocalypse (ch. vii.), Dan finds no place. For of this tribe alone do we find such a notice as the following:

Vers. 30, 31. And the sons of Dan set up the graven image for themselves; and Jonathan, the son of Gershom, the son of Moses, he and his sons, were priests to the tribe. Even as late as the last century, expositors (as Lillenthal, Commentar. Critica, p. 192) have defended the reading Manasseh, despite its suspended  $\aleph$ , and found approval in so doing (cf. Ernesti, Theol. Bibliothek, 1771, p. 112). Whoever is able to form a conception of the exegetical scrupulousness of the Jewish transcribers, will readily perceive that if  $\aleph$  had not stood in the MSS., that reading could never have been introduced. The Talmudic teachers admit this (Baba bathra, 109 a), and ascribe the circumstance that Moses could have such a descendant, to his wife (cf. Jalkut, n. 72). Now, although it be touching to observe the reverential piety which could not bear to have the name of Moses connected with that of an idolatrous priest, and which, therefore, without altering the Hebrew text itself, as early as the time of the Talmudical teachers, read the suspended  $\aleph$  in  $\aleph$ שדן, the proceeding stands nevertheless in striking contrast with the admirable frankness of Biblical writers, who without regard to men state facts as they are, and direct the confidence of the faithful people, away from mortals, to the living God alone. The priest would not have been named at all, but for the wish to point out the contrast between his descent from the lawgiver who, in the name of God, condemned all idolatry as mortal sin, and his official position as priest at the shrine of an image. To this contrast alone, Jonathan owes it that his name was not forgotten. Sad, undoubtedly, beyond most similar cases, is this instance of degeneracy. But Scripture, which does not conceal the human weakness of even Moses himself, humbles herewith all vanity based on ancestors and descent. It avails nothing to be a descendant of Moses, if there be no personal worth; and the incomparable greatness and legal purity of the ancestor, give no guaranty that his descendants shall not become apostates. The fate of Moses, in this respect, was equally that of Abraham and Jacob, from whom Dan was descended. Many have called themselves children of Christ, who acted as Micah did. It is, no doubt, remarkable, that while Micah's priest was a descendant of Moses, he himself was an Ephraimite, consequently of the same tribe with Joshua. The priest is called Jonathan, the son of Gershom, the son of Moses, not as if he were the immediate son of Gershom, but as being descended from Moses through Gershom. The significance of the statement lies in the contrast between descendant and ancestor. It is this also that is made prominent by the Talmudists, when in connection with the change of Moses into Manasseh, they associate the latter name with the idolatrous king of Judah. Since Manasseh, the progenitor of the tribe of the same name, was not a Levite, they could not think of him, as but for this we might suppose.<sup>1</sup>

Until the day of the exile of the ark (land).

The words עָרִיִּים גְּלוּת הָאָרֶץ have acquired extraordinary importance for the criticism of the Book of Judges. Had the passage been found less peculiarly adapted to prove the late composition of our Book, bringing it down to a time after the exile under Shalmaneser, the attention of critics would doubtless have been arrested by the singularity of the expression עָרִיִּים גְּלוּת הָאָרֶץ, "unto the captivity of the land." For, properly speaking, there was no such thing as a "captivity of the land." A captivity of Jerusalem (Jer. i. 3), of Judah (Jer. xl. 1), of Samaria (cf. 2 Kgs. xvii. 28, בְּשָׁמְרוֹן), of Jehoiachin (2 Kgs. xxv. 27), of Cush (Isa. xx. 4), is indeed spoken of, for these are historical names, representative of historical nations that were carried into exile. But erets, land, is not an historical, but only a natural name. A "captivity of Canaan" would be intelligible, but not a "captivity of the land." Moreover, there were no other "captivities" than those of Israel and Judah. Now, since only the former could be intended, and since a definition of time is to be given, we should expect to find it definitely connected either with Samaria or Israel (cf. 2 Kgs. xvii. 23, וַיִּגְלֵל יִשְׂרָאֵל; cf. 2 Kgs. xv. 29; xviii. 11). Nor does the verb לְקַח, to take into exile or captivity, or its cognate nouns, ever occur in connection with אֶרֶץ (land) alone, while in 2 Kgs. xxiv. 15 we find the entirely intelligible expression: וַיִּגְלֵל אֶת אֲרָמֵי

הָאָרֶץ, "he carried away the nobles of the land."

The linguistic improbability of the assumption that the narrator wrote הָאָרֶץ, the land, is reinforced by even stronger historical considerations. In the first place, there would arise an irremovable contradiction between vers. 30 and 31, if according to the one the cultus of the image at Dan continued until the exile of Israel, while according to the other it endured only to—say the death of Eli. For Bertheau's endeavor to show that no such contradiction arises, cannot stand examination. The descendants of Jonathan are spoken of, not as having been priests in general, but most definitely as having served the פֶּסֶל, image, of the tribe of Dan. For this reason, the setting up of the image (וַיִּקְרָא) and the appointment to its priesthood, are first spoken of, in ver. 30, while its permanent preservation and maintenance (וַיִּשְׁמְרוּ) are set forth in ver. 31. This was already seen by Jewish expositors, who were not influenced by what Bertheau calls "pet ideas" of modern times. R. Jesaia says: The exile of Sanherib, cannot be meant; for the time during which the House of God was at Shiloh is spoken of. It must also be considered quite improbable that this separatistic idolatrous worship in Dan should have been allowed to exist unmolested during the time of Samuel, David, and Solomon. The story of Micah's image is introduced with the words, "in those days there was no king in Israel," in order to explain the possibility of such an occurrence. Could the author have written thus, if the history of the kings, from Jeroboam to Manasseh, had already been before him? And was not David just such a king as there was not in the time of Micah? Read the history of the first years of Solomon, the eighth chapter of the first Book of Kings among others, and consider whether it seem possible to receive the existence at that time of a separate idolatrous worship in Dan, with a priestly family of its own. And, certainly, if such a worship had still existed when Jeroboam cut himself loose from the house of David, he would not have found it necessary to institute in that very place the new cultus of the calf. Not upon him, would the burden of this sin have rested in that case (cf. 1 Kgs. xiv. 16). Nor, if in his time there had been a family of Levitical priests in Dan, would he have needed to look for others, "who were not of the sons of Levi" (1 Kgs. xii. 31).

Menassis vel מִנְשֶׁה Moysi; Menassis, studio et imitatione imitatus, Moysi, prosapia. Cf. Buxtorff, Tiber. p. 171. Later Rabbins say the same thing. R. Tanchum calls the writing מִנְשֶׁה with ] suspended, a סופרים, תוקן מִנְשֶׁה

If what has here been briefly<sup>2</sup> stated be duly considered, it will be felt to be necessary to substitute וַיִּגְלֵל, the ark of the covenant, for הָאָרֶץ, the land. This departure from the letter of Scripture is demanded by true reverence for its spirit. It is no wonder, therefore, that even the positive expositors among the Jews maintained that הָאָרֶץ must be explained as וַיִּגְלֵל, although naturally they do not speak of another reading. Thus Kimchi: דָּוָם יום שְׁנֵי הָאָרֶץ. Abarbanel takes it in a similar manner.<sup>3</sup> It was probably under the influence of similar considerations that Houbigant conjecturally read וַיִּגְלֵל, to which Bleek (Einleitung, p. 347) and Ewald (Alterthümer, p. 258, 2d ed.) are likewise strongly inclined. The conjecture is so clear and easy, that the refusal to entertain it may well be met with the saying, "the letter killeth." The statement intended to be and speaks of בֶּן מִנְשֶׁה as Kethibh, and of בֶּן מִנְשֶׁה on the other hand, as Keri. According to this, ben Mosheh is certainly the original reading, albeit the reading ben Menasseh is also very old, seeing that it was read by the Targum, the Peshito, and the Septuagint, although in a few codices of the latter the reading ben Mosse is still found, cf. Kennic. Dissert. Gener. in V. T. § 21. Jerome also has filius Moysi. — Ta.]

<sup>2</sup> For much of it was long since strongly brought forward (cf. Kell in loco). [Kell, it may be proper to remark, does not propose to change the reading, but quotes approvingly Hengstenberg's explanation of it, as indicated in the following words: "The historian considers the whole land as carried away into captivity in its sanctuary, which, as it were, formed its kernel and essence" (Pent. i. 191. Ryland's edit.). — Ta.]

made is, that the priests in Dan served at the shrine of the idol until the exile of the ark. It is precisely the Book of Samuel, in which the capture of the ark is related, that uses the word גָּלָה more frequently than any other historical book. The wife of the slain priest cries out, while she gives birth to a child, and dies: גָּלָה קְבוֹרָהּ, "gone is glory from Israel" (1 Sam. iv. 21); and hence, the son whom she bore was called "Ichabod: where is the glory." The very same word is here used. Now, the removal of the ark, and the death of the sons of Eli, were matters of extraordinary importance, not for the people only, but more especially for the priests. Their pride and sinfulness had been previously delineated by the narrative. They had thought, without repentance, to conquer with the sacred ark. The humiliation touched them with peculiar force. Eli dies from dismay; his sons are slain by the enemy; the ark of the covenant, the precious jewel of the priestly charge, falls into the hands of the heathen. The moral degeneracy of the priestly family is already indicated in the election of Samuel. He, too, was an Ephraimite, but one of a different stamp from Micah. Now, however, the whole fabric of priestly pride falls into ruins, and under the leadership of Samuel, the era of repentance begins. It is only when all this is taken into consideration, that the parallelism of vers. 30 and 31 stands out in unexpected light. Jonathan and his descendants, sons of Levi and of Moses, continued to officiate as priests in Dan, until the ark went into exile. After this great national calamity, a reformation ensued, including both the head and the members. The priests were terrified, and repented; their vainglorious assumption that wherever they were there the worship of God was also, was thoroughly overthrown, and they retired from the theatre of their evil doing. For this reason it is said of Jonathan and his successors, that "they were priests עַד-גָּלוּת הָאָרֶץ, until the exile of the ark." And as in ver. 30 the duration of their priestly activity corresponds with the time that intervened until the fall of the ark, so in ver. 31, the idolatrous House of Micah stands in contrast with the House of the true God in Shiloh. The same point of time is indicated in both verses. For with the removal of the ark, the significance of Shiloh ceased. Where the ark was, there God could be inquired of.<sup>2</sup> With the fall of the ark, the priests in Dan ceased; when the true sanctuary in Shiloh was broken up, the spurious sanctuary of Micah also was no longer esteemed. The lesson conveyed is, that if the true spirit of devotion to Jehovah had been preserved in connection with Shiloh and the ark of the covenant, such things as were done by Micah and in Dan would have been morally impossible. The priesthood must suffer and repent, before idolatry could be removed. It is true, that while the House of Micah was formerly spoken of as a Beth Elohim, a term applicable to every heathen temple as well, the House at Shiloh is here called Beth ha-Elohim, House of the true and real God; but it is nevertheless very significant that it is not called Beth Jehovah. During Shiloh's existence, the glory of the Levites had become greatly tarnished. The descendants of Aaron — as witness the sons of Eli — had desecrated their office; the descendants of Moses served the idol in Dan. But when with the fall of the ark the time of repentance had come for the priests of Aaron's tribe, the sin of the children of Moses also came to an end. Repentance leads the children back to their fathers.

In this way, the necessity of finding in our text a reference to the removal of the ark demonstrates itself both externally and internally. The fact that this exposition is not found indicated in the Masora, is to be explained from the fidelity with which every letter was preserved, but especially from the circumstance that during the exile of the people, the minds of the writers and readers of the ancient manuscripts were naturally full of that sad event, while the historical fact of the exile of the ark of the covenant belonged to the hoary past. In exile, Israel read and found this fate on every page. To their thoughts, "the land," which they had left, was ever present. The banished reads "home," in every thing.

1 The great significance of the exile of the ark of the covenant, was still fully felt when Ps. lxxviii. was written, compare vers. 60 and 61: "He rejected the tabernacle of Shiloh," and "He delivered his strength (glory) into captivity." The whole bearing of the psalm forbids the supposition of a sanctuary in Shiloh until the Assyrian period (Deitzsch, on Ps. lxxviii. 60 ff.).

2 This is also clearly proved by ch. xx. 27: "And the sons of Israel inquired of Jehovah; for the ark of the covenant of God was there in those days."

SECOND SECTION.

ANOTHER ILLUSTRATION OF THE EVILS THAT RESULT WHEN "EVERY MAN DOES WHAT IS GOOD IN HIS OWN EYES."

A Levite, whose concubine has left him, goes to her father's house, and persuades her to return. On their journey home, they enter Gibeah to pass the night there, but are inhospitably left in the market-place, until an Ephraimite resident of the city takes them home.

CHAPTER XIX. 1-21.

- 1 And it came to pass in those days, when there was no king in Israel, that there was a certain Levite sojourning on the side [in the hinder parts] of mount Ephraim,
- 2 who took to him a concubine out of Beth-lehem-judah. And his concubine played the whore against him,<sup>1</sup> and went away from him unto her father's house to Beth-lehem-judah, and was there [some time (namely),] four whole [omit: whole]
- 3 months. And her husband arose, and went after her, to speak friendly unto her, and to bring her again,<sup>2</sup> having his servant with him, and a couple of asses : and she brought him into her father's house : and when the father of the damsel saw
- 4 him, he rejoiced to meet him. And his father-in-law, the damsel's father, retained him ; and he abode with him three days : so they did eat and drink, and lodged
- 5 there. And it came to pass on the fourth day, when [that] they arose early in the morning, that [and] he rose up to depart : and the damsel's father said unto his son-in-law, Comfort [Strengthen] thine heart with a morsel of bread, and afterward go
- 6 your way. And they sat down, and did eat and drink both of them together : for [and] the damsel's father had [omit: had] said unto the man, Be content, I pray
- 7 thee, and tarry all [pass the] night, and let thine heart be merry. And when the man rose up to depart, his father-in-law urged him : therefore he [turned and]
- 8 lodged there again. And he arose early in the morning on the fifth day to depart : and the damsel's father said, Comfort [Strengthen] thine heart, I pray thee. And they tarried<sup>4</sup> until afternoon [until the day declined], and they did eat both of
- 9 them. And when the man rose up to depart, he, and his concubine, and his servant, his father-in-law, the damsel's father, said unto him, Behold now, the day draweth toward evening, I pray you tarry all [pass the] night : [and again:] behold, the day groweth to an end [declines], lodge here, that [and let] thine heart may [omit: may] be merry ; and to-morrow [you shall] get you early on your way,
- 10 that thou mayest go home [and thou shalt go to thy tent]. But the man would not tarry that night, but he rose up and departed, and came over against Jebus, which is Jerusalem : and there were with him two asses saddled, his concubine also was
- 11 with him. And when they were by Jebus, the day was far spent ; and the servant said unto his master, Come, I pray thee, and let us turn in into this city of the
- 12 Jebusites, and lodge in it. And his master said unto him, We will not turn aside hither<sup>4</sup> into the city of a stranger, that is not of the children [sons] of Israel ;
- 13 we will pass over to [as far as] Gibeah. And he said unto his servant, Come,<sup>5</sup> [forward:] and let us draw near to one of these [the ne. neighboring] places [,] to lodge
- 14 all [and pass the] night, [omit: ,] in Gibeah, or in Ramah. And they passed on and went their way ; and the sun went down upon them when they were by Gibeah,
- 15 which belongeth to Benjamin. And they turned aside thither, to go in and to lodge in Gibeah : and when he went in, he sat him down in a street [the open space] of
- 16 the city : for [and] there was no man that took them into his house to lodging. And behold, there came an old man from his work out of the field at even, which was also [and the man was] of mount Ephraim ; and he sojourned in Gibeah ; but the 17 men of the place were Benjamites. And when [omit: when] he had [omit: had] lifted up his eyes, he [and] saw a [the] wayfaring man in the street [open space] of the city: and the old man said, Whither goest thou? and whence comest thou? 18 And he said unto him, We are passing from Beth-lehem-judah toward the [hinder] side of mount Ephraim; from thence am I: and I went to Beth-lehem-judah, but I am now going to the house of the Lord [Jehovah];<sup>a</sup> and there is no man that 19 receiveth me to house. Yet there is [we have] both straw and provender for our asses; and there is [we have] bread and wine also for me, and for thy handmaid, and for the young man which is with thy servants: there is no want of any thing. 20 And the old man said, Peace be with thee; howsoever [only], let all thy wants be 21 upon me; only lodge not in the street [open space]. So he brought him into his house, and gave provender unto the asses: and they washed their feet, and did eat and drink.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 2. — וַתִּזְכֹּר עָלָיו. Dr. Cassel renders: Und es geltete seinem Nebenweib über ihn hinaus; which may possibly be good interpretation, but cannot be admitted as translation. The Sept. and Vulg. do not render the phrase at all, while the Chaldee softens it down to "she despised him." Hence, it has been thought that the present reading of the Hebrew text is wrong; but the fact that the Peshito has it, and that the other ancient versions do not agree in their reading, shows that the diversity arises from a sense of incongruity between what was affirmed of the woman and the efforts of the Levite to recover her. עָלָיו is "against him." — Ta.]

2 Ver. 3. — The keri לְחַשְׁבָּה is evidently the more appropriate reading, as Studer and Bertheau have conceded. [In the kethibh, לְחַשְׁבָּה, the suffix refers to the preceding לָב: "to cause her heart to return," i. e., to turn again to her husband. Compare Kell, who deems the keri a "needless correction." — Ta.]

3 Ver. 8. — וְתִתְּנוּ לָאָבִי. Older Jewish expositors, as Abarbanel and Meir Obernick, very properly take this, not as imperative, but as 3d per. perf. It is against the sense to make the father say: "Delay till it become evening." Ver. 9 also is against this. On the word, see ch. iii. 26. Bena has correctly: cunctati sunt.

[4 Ver. 12. — The "hither" of the E. V. seems to be intended as a rendering of הֵנָּה, which, however, belongs to the next clause. הֵנָּה must be taken with הַיָּשָׁר, in the sense שָׁם . . . הַיָּשָׁר, "where." "It is true" (says Bertheau), "that הֵנָּה does not elsewhere occur in this construction with הַיָּשָׁר, but this is the only suitable way of taking it here, for it cannot be the plur. fem. pronoun, and must therefore mean 'there.'" The proper rendering of the verse, then, would be: "We will not turn aside into the city of the stranger, where there are none of the sons of Israel." The E. V. leaves it doubtful whether "that" refers to "city" or to "stranger." Dr. Cassel refers it to the latter, and ignores the הֵנָּה altogether. — Ta.]

[5 Ver. 13. — הֵן is for הֵנָּה, the imperative of הֵנָּה, with He paragogic. — לָנֶפֶס is the 1st per. plur. perfect, contracted from לָנֶפְסֵנוּ. — Ta.]

[6 Ver. 18. — וְאֶת־בֵּית יְהוָה אֲנִי הֹלֵךְ. The meaning of this clause is obscure. The Sept. renders as if it read וְאֶת־בֵּית יְהוָה: I am going to my house. The Targum, Peshito, Vulgate, and among moderns, Bertheau, De Wette, Bunsen (the two latter in their versions), take וְאֶת־בֵּית יְהוָה as the accusative, and render as the E. V. Others, as Studer, Kell, and our author, take אֶת as a preposition, in the sense "with," "at," or "by:" "I walk by (or, in) the House of Jehovah," i. e., I perform priestly service in connection with the sanctuary. This gives a good sense (cf. the commentary below), but the mode of expressing it seems singular. On the other hand, there is no compulsory evidence in favor of this and against the other rendering. The sanctuary being at Shiloh, there is (so far as the site of this place is known) no conflict between the Levite's first statement that he is going to the "hinder parts" (a necessarily indefinite expression) of the mountains of Ephraim, and his subsequent supplementary statement that he is going to the "House of Jehovah." Kell's objection that אֶת הַיָּשָׁר does not mean to go to a place, but to pass through it (cf. Deut. i. 19; Isa. i. 10. etc.), cannot be considered decisive. Since the "through" does not lie in the אֶת, it proves only that the accusative may indicate either the place to which, or that through which, one goes. It is true, that the place to which one goes, is usually put in the accusative without אֶת, either with or without הַ local: but as אֶת was constantly used with the definite accusative, and had withal so entirely lost all meaning of its own, it is certainly quite conceivable that it might almost unconsciously slip from the pen in a place where ordinarily common usage did not employ it. And since, as already remarked, the idea of "through" does not lie in אֶת, it may well be asked whether the instances referred to by Kell are not exceptions to common usage quite as much as the present phrase. Upon the whole, we are inclined to adopt the rendering of the E. V. — Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Ver. 1. When there was no king in Israel. The following narrative has, indeed, as was already remarked, no special connection, either chronological or local, with the history related in chaps. xvii. and xviii.; but it none the less affords, in conjunction with that history, occasion for a series of observations which testify, in a highly instructive manner, of the organic idea which pervades the whole Book. We shall attempt to indicate them at the close of the narrative. "There was no king in Israel:" this alone it was that made the occurrences of both chaps. xvii. and xviii., and chaps. xix.-xxi. possible. In the present history also, a Levite is involved. The decay of the priesthood is here also indicated. From the connection it is sufficiently clear that the conduct of the Levite who, living in the northern part of the mountains of Ephraim, procures himself a concubine out of Bethlehem—probably for no other reason than that, as Josephus rightly conjectures, he was smitten with her beauty,—is not approved. From the fact that the residence of the Levite is here spoken of as being in the "hinder parts" of the mountains, by which the northern parts are to be understood, no reliable inference can be drawn as to the locality of the writer; for the Levite himself uses the same expression (ver. 18). Since the Levite took a concubine (לְוִיִּיתָא שְׂכִמָּה), it must be assumed that he already had a wife. Else why did he not make this woman his wife? For other grounds, such as have been conjectured, find no support in the narrative. Precisely here lies the blot upon the character of the priest, which the narrative hints at. The word שְׂכִמָּה is both etymologically and in sense identical with the Greek and Roman πάλλαξ, peller, παλλαξ; but Benfey's derivation cannot be received. The sense "concubine," which the word has, may perhaps be explained from שְׂכִמָּה. Among the ancient Greeks also the taking of a concubine was not considered exactly blameworthy, but Laertes refrained from touching Euryclia for "fear of the anger of his wife" (Odys. i. 434). The sequel shows that the Levite had done better if he had not taken a concubine. A concubine also was the ruin of Gideon's family (ch. viii. 31).

Ver. 2. And the concubine lusted after others beside himself. The concubine was unchastely disposed. This is only a stronger expression for what the moderns mean when with palliative extenuation they say: "She did not love her husband." Her sensuality was not satisfied with the Levite. In this way the narrator explains the ground of her leaving him. The correctness of לְוִיִּיתָא was frequently doubted in former days, but only because the connection of the entire narrative was misapprehended. לְוִיִּיתָא is to play the harlot, not only in act, but also in disposition and spirit (cf. μοιχεύειν ἐν τῇ καρδίᾳ, Matt. v. 28): hence used also of idolatry. In the added לְוִיִּיתָא, "over him,"<sup>1</sup> it is delicately indicated that she did not so act as to be put away by him, but that she was of such a disposition as to be unwilling to live with him. That she left him without his consent can have had its ground only in her concupiscent, which the narrator intentionally designates by the term לְוִיִּיתָא, in order to blame the Levite for yet running after such a woman.<sup>2</sup> For it is written, Lev. xxi. 7: "A לְוִיִּיתָא, harlot, and one polluted, they shall not take to wife." Although this passage speaks only of the sons of Aaron, it applies nevertheless to all who, as the Levite says of himself, "walk in the house of Jehovah" (ver. 18). And she was there some time (about) four months. She had perhaps gone away under pretext of visiting her parents, and did not come back. The לְוִיִּיתָא before the more definite statement of time, expresses the Latin circiter. As she had already remained away some four months, it looked as if she would not return to her husband's house at all; wherefore the Levite set out to persuade her to come back. He should not have done this, since she was such as that it was said of her: לְוִיִּיתָא. Her father, for his part, ought to have sent her back; for the Levite had undoubtedly not failed to pay him a morning-gift (cf. Ex. xxii. 15), the remembrance of which, and the fear that if his daughter did not go back with her husband he might be called upon to return it, had probably no little influence in producing the friendliness with which he received him. Such was also the ancient Homeric custom, as illustrated in the instance of Hephaistos, who having proved the infidelity of his spouse, demands back the gifts with which he had presented her father (Odys. viii. 318).

Ver. 3. And her husband arose and went after her. The Levite, however, desires only the woman, not any money. Hence it is said that he went after her in order to speak "to her heart." And he shows it by bringing two asses with him,—one of them for her use. It never occurs to him to think that her father may perhaps provide her with one. Only after the daughter has again become friendly to him, does he allow her to lead him to her father. The uncommon hospitality which the latter extends to the Levite, has, it must be allowed, a peculiar by-taste to it. No doubt, it is apologetic in its design, and expressive of a wish for reconciliation. This is clearly enough expressed in the acts of eating and drinking together. But the urgency with which after three days he presses the Levite to remain, although the latter is desirous of returning home, is not sanctioned by the delicate laws of ancient hospitality. The incident illustrates the beauty of the words which Menelaus addresses to Telemachus who desires to go home (Odys. xv. 69): "I will not detain thee here; for I also am angry with a host who through troublesome friendship offers troublesome enmity; for order is best in everything. Equally bad are both he who hastens the guest who would stay, and he who detains him who would go" (cf. Nägelsbach, Hom. Theol. p. 256). The injuriousness of exaggerated hospitality is here also put in instructive contrast with the utter absence of it, which it fell to the lot of the Levite soon to experience.

Vers. 4-9. And his father-in-law detained him. The carnal nature of the Levite manifests itself here also. Soon after the reconciliation, he wished to depart again; but he yields, and spends three days in eating and drinking. On the fourth morning, he will go; but his host urges him first to take a "morsel of bread." He might nevertheless have set out on his journey; but "they also and drank," and it became evening. He proposed indeed to go, but turned about and remained. On the fifth morning, everything is ready for a start. But refreshments are first taken at the request of the host: they "both ate," and thus spent the day until the evening approached. No right-minded Levite manifests himself here. We hear of nothing but eating and drinking. It reflects no honor on a man who "walks in the house of God," that he runs after a concubine, and cannot resist a good table.

When, however, at last he sets out, late in the afternoon, his conscience appears to urge him forward, and to make him ashamed of having remained so long. Perhaps he has no time to spare, if with his servant and animals, he is to rest at home on the Sabbath. For if we may suppose that the reconciliation took place on the Sabbath, the first three days of feasting would fall on our Sunday, Monday, and Tuesday: the "fourth day" of ver. 5 would be Wednesday, and the "fifth day" our Thursday; and he might think it possible to reach home before the next evening. But in that case no time was to be lost. His experience is that of all weak and vacillating people: first, unnecessary delay, and then overstrained hurry.

The delineation of these scenes, which repeat themselves so frequently in life, is notwithstanding its brevity, full of vivacity and beauty. The guests continually rise at early daybreak (בִּבְרֹךְ); but the evening still finds them in the same place. The host is unwearied in encouragements "to refresh the heart" (וַיִּשֶׁבֶט לִבָּם, קָצֵר לִבָּם);<sup>1</sup> but the "refreshing" continues until "the day declines." Verses 8 and 9 especially give a striking picture of irresolution and dilatoriness. They permit us to follow the various stages of the day that were thus dissipated. With breakfast they lingered along (וַיִּשְׁבְּרוּ חֵיָם) until (וַיִּשְׁבְּרוּ חֵיָם) say after noon. While they prepare themselves anew to take their departure, time passes, and the host begs them to remain, "for the day draweth toward evening;" and after a little more lingering — for this idea must be interposed before וַיִּשְׁבְּרוּ חֵיָם — he is able to urge, "spend the night, for the day declines."

It is unmistakably clear that the father-in-law meant it well with the Levite, when, according to general popular usage, he overwhelmed him with food and drink and pressing invitations; but it is incumbent on Levites especially, not to be too much taken up with such matters. It is better that they make it evident, that in case of necessity they are quite content with a path lechem, a morsel of bread.

Vers. 10 ff. But the man would not tarry that

<sup>2</sup> It does not by any means follow from this, however, that the city at that time did not yet bear the name Jerusalem. The place was still a Jebusite city; and that fact is here made prominent in order to explain why the Levite would not turn in thither.

<sup>3</sup> [This identification of Gibeah with Jeba does not appear to be tenable; for it makes it incomprehensible how the Levite could come to Gibeah before he came to Ramah, as the narrative manifestly implies that he did. Kell also most strangely speaks here of Gibeah as being Jeba, although on Josh. xviii. 23, he identifies it with Tullei el Fûl, a high hill night. At last — but now unseasonably, for the night is at hand — he is firm in his resolution to depart. The sun is already rapidly declining, when he comes past Jerusalem, at that time still called Jebus,<sup>2</sup> for the tribe of Benjamin had not yet conquered it (ch. i. 21). He will not turn in thither, although advised to do so by his servant, because he has "two saddled asses and his concubine with him," — the repetition of which statement is thus explained, — and the city belongs not to Israel. In other words, he fears lest in Jebus the rights of hospitality might be violated, and himself be plundered. He hastens forward, therefore, in order to reach one of the Israelitish cities farther on, Gibeah, perhaps, or Ramah. He succeeds only in reaching the former. Darkness had set in: it was unavoidably necessary to stay there over night. It will soon be seen that it would have been better if he had not suffered himself to be detained in the morning, and that he could not have done worse if he had turned into the heathen city.

Vers. 15-21. And no man took them to his house. Gibeah (the present Jeba, Geba),<sup>3</sup> lies an hour from Ramah (at present er-Râm), about two and a half hours from Jerusalem,<sup>4</sup> and towards four hours from Bethlehem. It belonged to Benjamin. Strangers disposed themselves on the open space or square of the city (רֹחֹב, platea), whence according to ancient usage the residents took them to their own homes. Alian relates (Var. Hist. iv. 1), that the Lucanians went so far as to make the man who did not show hospitality to the stranger entering the city at sunset, liable to legal punishment. But here in Israel, where love toward the stranger was enjoined by the law (Deut. x. 19), and where Job exclaims: "The stranger did not lodge in the street" (ch. xxxi. 32), no one invited the traveller to the shelter of his roof.

This inhospitable disposition was characteristic only of the inhabitants of this city; for a man of Ephraim, who resided in Gibeah, did not share it. When he, an old man, came from the field, and saw that a stranger had already made preparations to pass the night in the open air, he went to him with hospitable intent. That he first asks, Whence art thou? and whither goest thou? is only the result of his astonishment that anybody should purpose to pass the night in Gibeah out of doors. For the city had probably a bad name in the neighboring region, so that, when possible, it was shunned by travellers. Hence the question, Whence comest thou, that thou hast turned in here for the night?

My walk in life is at the house of Jehovah. The narrator has hitherto spoken of the Levite only as "the man." The character of a Levite did not show itself in him. But now, in his answer to the aged Ephraimite, the Levite himself makes mention of his order. I come, he says, about midway between Jerusalem and er-Râm. This place, fixed upon by Robinson (B. R. i. 577), and after him by Ritter (cf. Gage's transl. iv. 219), and many others, is undoubtedly the site of the ancient Gibeah (cf. Smith's Exc. Dict. s. v. "Gibeah"). The distance of Gibeah from Jerusalem given by Josephus (compare the next note) agrees with this; for the distance of Tullei el Fûl from Jerusalem is about two-thirds that of Bethlehem (while Jeba is much farther. cf. Dr. Cassel's "two hours and a half"). Jeba is the Geba of Scripture (Rob. i. 440; Exc. Dict. s. v. "Geba"). — Ta.]

from Bethlehem, but reside behind the mountains. The purpose for which he went to Bethlehem, he does not communicate; but, on the other hand, he does take occasion to state that he is a Levite (Josephus). He expresses this paraphrastically, by saying that "he walks in the house of God," namely, as a servant of God. He chooses this form of expression in order to invite hospitality, and to place the refusal of it in its worst light. A man who is at home in the House of God, no one here receives into his house. But one degeneracy follows in the wake of another. When Levites are so weak as he has shown himself, the virtues of others cannot continue strong. The dignity of which it now occurs to him to speak, he himself should have respected heretofore. The explanation of וְאֵת־בֵּית יְהוָה אֵלַי הֹלֵךְ, as if it meant, "and I am going to the house of Jehovah," is not only philologically difficult, but on account of the sense, impossible.<sup>1</sup> Whither he goes, he has already said, namely, to the rear part of the mountains; he wishes now to say who he is; that he enjoys the dignity of walking "with (i. e., in) the house of Jehovah," as its servant. He is very anxious to obtain shelter, for the prospect of spending the night in an inhospitable city without a roof over him, could not but fill him with apprehensions. The same cause prevented him from continuing his journey. Hence the humble request to the aged householder to take him in. He has everything necessary with him, — his entertainer shall be at no expense. He speaks of himself as his "servant," and of the woman as "thy handmaid." The old man gladly complies with the ancient hospitable usage, according to which animals are fed first, and the wants of men are attended to afterwards.

<sup>1</sup> This also removes the supposition that the Levite was from Shiloh. This is not to be assumed, since it is not stated. The above words give no more information concerning the birth-place of the Levite, than is conveyed in the general statement that he was a Levite.

CHAPTER XIX. 22-30.

- 22 Now as they were making their hearts merry, behold, the men of the city, certain [omit: certain] sons of Belial [worthless fellows], beset the house round about, and beat at the door, and spake to the master of the house, the old man, saying, Bring forth the man that came into thine house, that we may know him.
- 23 And the man, the master of the house, went out unto them, and said unto them, Nay, my brethren, nay, I pray you, do not so wickedly; seeing that this man is
- 24 come into mine house, do not this folly. Behold, here is my daughter, a maiden [virgin], and his concubine; them I will bring out now, and humble ye them, and do with them what seemeth good unto you: but unto this man do not so vile a thing
- 25 [as the matter of this folly]. But the men would not hearken to him: so the man took his concubine, and brought her forth unto them; and they knew her, and abused her all the night until the morning: and when the day began to spring, they
- 26 let her go. Then came the woman in the dawning of the day, and fell down at
- 27 the door of the man's house where her lord was, [and lay there] till it was light. And her lord rose up in the morning, and opened the doors of the house, and went out to go his way: and behold, the woman his concubine was fallen down at the door
- 28 of the house, and her hands were upon the threshold. And he said unto her, Up, and let us be going. But none answered. Then the man took her up upon an
- 29 [the] ass, and the man rose up, and gat him unto his place. And when he was come into his house, he took a knife, and laid hold on his concubine, and divided her, together with [according to] her bones, into twelve pieces, and sent her into
- 30 all the coasts [country] of Israel. And it was so, that all that saw it, said,<sup>1</sup> There was no such deed done nor seen from the day that the children [sons] of Israel came up out of the land of Egypt unto this day: consider of it, take advice, and speak your minds.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

the Levite expects from his action. It is only necessary to supply a לֵאמֹר before וַיִּהְיֶה, which in lively narration or agitated discourse is frequently omitted (cf. e. g. Ex. viii. 5 with Judg. vii. 2). The narrator uses the perfects, instead of the imperfects with simple וַ, usual in clauses expressive of design, quia quod futurum esse providebat tanquam factum animo suo observabatur (Roennmüller). The Levite's expectation that the moral indignation of all the tribes will be roused against such wickedness, and will lead them to resolve on punishment, is thus represented not as a doubtful conjecture, but as the confident anticipation of a certainly ensuing fact" (Kell). It is impossible to imitate this exactly in English, but the better rendering of the passage would be: "sent her into all the territory of Israel, saying [or, as we would say, thinking] it shall be that all who see shall say, There was no such deed done or seen," etc. Chapter xx. shows, as Kell remarks, that the Levite was right in his anticipations. Dr. Cassel translates as the M. V. — Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Vers. 22 ff. The narrator is aware that he has to relate a history similar to the one that occurred in Sodom in the days of Lot; for at suitable points his language takes the same turns of expression (cf. Gen. xix. 5, 7, 8). Lot was only a resident in Sodom, just as here the aged Ephraimite is in Gibeah. He, like the latter, had invited the guests to his house. The Sodomites surrounded the house, and demanded the surrender of the strangers, as the Gibeathites do here. Lot proposes to bring forth his daughters, and the aged host of our history makes the same proposition. The dissimilarities, it is true, are equally conspicuous. The guests of Lot were angels, who frustrated all sinful designs: here, the entertainer receives but an imperfect Levite. Although the aged host cannot be compared with the hospitable nephew of Abraham, it must be admitted that he acts like a good Israelite. The men of Gibeah were personally sinners even beyond those of Sodom, for they had a God who does not tolerate such abominations. But their sin was the outbreaking of individual depravity; in Sodom it was the fruit of the national life. Hence, both were punished according to their guilt. Benjamin perished almost; Sodom was wholly destroyed. In Sodom all sinned, from the youth to the gray head (Gen. xix. 4): in Gibeah, the criminals were "sons of wickedness," who, however, by being called אֲנָשֵׁי הָעִיר, "men of the city," are shown to belong to the higher classes, which circumstance also accounts for their unchecked attainment of such great proficiency in evil. This nightly vagabondizing of wanton youth was but too well known to antiquity, even in Roman times, when Roman emperors took part in it. Here, however, unholy, idolatrous usages seem also to have come into play, according to which strangers were abused for purposes of sensuality, as, contrariwise, in the service of the Syrian Goddess natives were given up to the stranger. It was a night-riot, which began with sundown and ceased with the morning. Hence, the Levite probably remained unmolested until night had fully set in, and could depart unhindered when the day broke.

It was at all events a fearful crime in Israel. The Mosaic law punished it with death (Lev. xx. 13; cf. ch. xviii. 22, etc.). Even the infringement of the rights of hospitality was in Hesiod's opinion, which was followed by the later Greeks, a crime of equal magnitude with adultery or the defilement of a father's bed (Nägelsbach, Nachhom. Theol. 252 f.). The aged host was, therefore, right in speaking of the matter as a בְּקָלָהּ, an abominable crime. But the savage Benjamites are no more willing to hear reason than the men of Sodom were. Their violent thundering at the door (בְּתַנְתְּוֹתֵיהֶם), and their language (cf. Gen. xix. 9), afforded sufficient occasion to the host to fear that they would soon break into the house itself. He is most especially concerned to shield the Levite, for in this direction lay the chief crime. Hence, no requisition is made upon the servant to give himself up for his master — for that would not have changed the nature of the crime, — but the host, like Lot, offers them women,<sup>1</sup> his own daughter being one. But he is not called upon to make this sacrifice: the Benjamites will not have his daughter; for she is no stranger, and belongs to their neighbor. It is especially to this offer of his daughter that the opening words of ver. 25 apply: "they would not hearken." Hereupon the Levite takes his resolution, and leads forth his concubine. Her beauty pacifies the violent wantons; but she herself falls a victim to their horrible lusts. The beastly treatment she receives deprives her of life. What an awful lesson! The same woman, whose sensuality was heretofore unsatisfied, is now killed by excess of illicit intercourse. The Levite who, notwithstanding her wanton disposition, runs after her, is now obliged to give her up to others.<sup>2</sup> She who would not live for him, must now die for him. — In Christendom, also, similar horrors have occurred. Who could bear to write the history of licentiousness! At the close of the fourteenth century a Thuringian knight abducted a maiden. Placing her on his horse behind himself, he intended to reach Erfurt the same evening before the closing of the city-gates. He failed, and was compelled to seek shelter with the maiden in the hospital situated outside of the city. The inmates, when they saw the beautiful woman, murdered the knight, and abused her until she died. The crime being discovered, the house was burned down, together with the criminals (Falkenstein, Hist. von Erfurt, p. 277).

Vers. 29 f. And he came into his house. It must have been a fearful night for the Levite, knowing that his concubine was in the power of the wanton mob, and it was a terrible morning when he found her dead on the threshold of the house. He had risen early, and made better haste to get away from the house of his host than he had done to leave that of his father-in-law, in order to avoid a meeting with the inhabitants.<sup>3</sup> His journey was a sad one; for his second ass carried

<sup>2</sup> This act of his also testifies to the degeneracy of the Levitical body. He has not moral strength enough to die in order to preserve himself from defilement, and hence thinks himself obliged to surrender his concubine. His own head, therefore, shares in the guilt of the crime done on the woman.

<sup>3</sup> [He probably gave up all idea of recovering his concubine, as being hopeless. So Bertheau and Kell. He may have entertained plans for rescuing her in some more effective way. There is at all events nothing in the text that justifies us to suppose that he went on his way, "as if he did not once think what had become of his unhappy companion," and was "reminded of her only by stumbling upon her lifeless corpse," as Bush rather wildly comments — Ta.]

the lifeless body of the dishonored woman. Filled with these horrors, perpetrated against him in Israel, he appeals to all the people of Israel. He cuts the corpse into twelve pieces, and sends them out in every direction. Expositors have one after another spoken here of Lucian's narrative (in Toraris) of the Scythian custom of sitting on the hide: "if any man is injured by another, and is unable to revenge himself, he sacrifices an ox, cuts up the flesh, and dresses it; then spreading the skin on the ground, he sits down on it, etc. Whoever pleases then comes, takes a part of the flesh, and placing his right foot on the hide, makes a solemn promise to assist him to the utmost of his abilities." It must be said that there is no analogy whatever between this usage and the act of the Levite. The Scythian usage is the symbolical formula of an oath, by which all who take part in it promise to unite themselves into one body with the suppliant. But such is not the idea in our passage, nor yet in 1 Sam. xi. 7. Saul sends out the pieces of the divided oxen with the threatening message, that thus it shall be done to the oxen of every one who does not take the field after him. The Levite has no fight to do anything of this kind. He issues no threat which he himself can execute. Nor does he place Israel under oath<sup>1</sup> to avenge his wrong. But he shows the nation what is possible within its borders, and what may happen to any one in Israel as well as it has happened to himself. Hence, he sends not a divided ox, but the divided woman. Saul threatens that the oxen of those who do not follow him, shall be cut to pieces. The Levite intimates that unless such practices are abolished in Israel, the same fate may befall any woman. He points to the anarchy which breaks out in Israel, when the rights of hospitality are no longer respected, and the rights of the householder no longer secure, and when heathen abominations like those of Sodom are practiced in the land.<sup>2</sup> The woman cut in pieces speaks more loudly than any other language could do. Of course, a message accompanied the pieces of the body, the contents of which are given in verse 30. Every one who saw must say that anything like this had not occurred in Israel since the nation dwelt in Canaan. It closed with the words: "Take the matter to heart, advise, and speak."

Doubtless, the divided body spake loudly to all the tribes of Israel. But it spoke not of repentance, but only of the necessity of taking prudent measures against the recurrence of similar outrages, of which any one might himself become the victim. And yet the thing needed was not merely the removal of the abomination which was manifest, but the conversion of the heart, whose hidden wickedness had produced the abomination. The Levite points to the sins that had been committed; but does he also confess the share he himself had in them, and in the guilt that attached to them? The same self-righteousness is revealed by the whole people, as is shown by ch. xx.

in cases of murder (adv. Aristocratem, p. 642); but here also none exists.

<sup>2</sup> This sense is also contained in the words of the Levite in ch. xx. 6.

The tribes of Israel, convened at Mizpah, resolve to punish the outrage committed at Gibeah. They call on the tribe of Benjamin to deliver up the guilty, but are met with a refusal.

CHAPTER XX. 1-18.

- 1 Then all the children [sons] of Israel went out, and the congregation was gathered together as one man, from Dan even to Beer-sheba, with [and] the land of
- 2 Gilead, unto the Lord [Jehovah] in Mizpeh [Mizpah]. And the chief [chiefs] of all the people, even of all the tribes of Israel, presented themselves in the assembly of the people of God, [which assembly numbered] four hundred thousand footmen
- 3 that drew sword.<sup>1</sup> (Now the children [sons] of Benjamin heard that the children [sons] of Israel were gone up to Mizpeh). Then said the children [sons] of Israel,
- 4 Tell us, how was [happened] this wickedness? And [the man,] the Levite, the husband of the woman that was slain, answered and said, I came into [unto]
- 5 Gibeah that belongeth to Benjamin, I and my concubine, to lodge. And the men [lords] of Gibeah rose against me, and beset the house round about upon me by night, and thought to have slain me: and my concubine have they forced [humbled],
- 6 that she is dead [that she died]. And I took my concubine, and cut her in pieces, and sent her throughout all the country of the inheritance of Israel: for they have
- 7 committed lewdness and folly in Israel. Behold, ye are all children [sons] of Is-
- 8 rael; give here your advice and counsel. And all the people arose as one man, saying, We will not any of us go to his tent, neither will we any of us turn into
- 9 his house: But now this shall be the thing which we will do to Gibeah: we will go

- 10 up by lot against it;<sup>2</sup> And we will take ten men of an hundred throughout all the tribes of Israel, and an hundred of a thousand, and a thousand out of ten thousand, to fetch victual for the people, that they may do, when they come to Gibeah of Benjamin, according to all the folly that they have wrought in Israel.<sup>3</sup> So all the men of Israel were gathered against the city, knit together as one man. And the tribes of Israel sent men through [into] all the tribe [tribes] of Benjamin, saying, What wickedness is this that is [was] done among you? Now therefore deliver us the men, the children of Belial [worthless fellows], which are in Gibeah, that we may put them to death, and put away evil from Israel. But the children [sons] of Benjamin would not hearken to the voice of their brethren the children [sons] of Israel.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 2. — Dr. Cassel renders this verse as follows: "And the heads of the whole people, out of all the tribes of Israel, formed themselves into a Congregation of the People of God, which [sc. people] furnished four hundred thousand men (namely) footmen, practiced with the sword." The E. V. is better; only, to make it unequivocally clear, it needs some such interpolation as we have suggested in the text. — Ta.]

[2 Ver. 9. — Dr. Cassel translates: "And now in the matter which we do against Gibeah, (proceed we) against it according to the lot." This does not differ essentially from the E. V., but is noted here as explaining what the author means by saying that the words "which we do against Gibeah" are parenthetical (see below). Bertheau and Kell explain:

"This is the thing we will do against Gibeah: against it with the lot!" "The words עָלֶיהָ בְּזָרִיז," says Kell, "contain the resolution taken with reference to the sinful city, and are characterized by the enigmatical brevity of judicial sentences, and are to be explained by the proceedings prescribed by the Mosaic law against the Canaanites. The Canaanites were to be destroyed, and their land was then to be divided among the Israelites by lot. Accordingly, to proceed with the lot against Gibeah, is to proceed with it as with the cities of the Canaanites, to conquer and burn it, and to divide its territory by lot." One argument advanced in favor of this (the view of the Peshito: "we will cast the lot over it!") and against the current view (that of the LXX), that the latter leaves the judgment itself unexpressed, and passes at once to a subordinate point which has reference only to the execution of the judgment, has no great force. For is not the judgment sufficiently expressed in עָלֶיהָ, "against it!"? The other, however, that according to ver. 10, as ordinarily understood, the lot decides, not who shall go against Gibeah, but who shall act as purveyors for the army, it is difficult to meet, except by rendering ver. 10 as Dr. Cassel does. Compare the next note. — Ta.]

[3 Ver. 10. — Dr. Cassel's rendering is as follows: (ver. 9 b) "proceed we against it according to the lot; (ver. 10:) and take ten men of a hundred out of all the tribes of Israel, and a hundred of a thousand, and a thousand of ten thousand, to take to themselves provisions for the host, and when they come to Gibeah of Benjamin to do according to all the abomination which it wrought in Israel (i. e., to inflict just retribution)." The only difficulty in this rendering is the expression "to take provisions for the host" (lit. people), which strikes one as an unnatural way of saying, "to take provisions for themselves." But this difficulty is less serious than that which arises if we adopt the common rendering, and explain (as we must do in that case) ver. 9 as Bertheau and Kell do (cf. preceding note). For the fact that before proceeding to extremities, demand is made for the surrender of the guilty, is incompatible with a prior determination to "cast the lot" over Gibeah, to say nothing of the fact that such a confiscation of territory belonging to Benjamin, as this is supposed to imply, would have been in glaring conflict with one of the most important laws of the nation, that which rendered land an inalienable possession, first in the family, then in the tribe. On the other hand, it certainly seems as if 40,000 men must have been deemed sufficient to meet the 26,700 of Benjamin (ver. 15); and the statement of ver. 17, where the 400,000 of Israel are set over against the 26,700 of Benjamin, may be explained by supposing that the narrator, being about to relate the terrible losses on the national side in the first two engagements, wishes to remind the reader of the reserved strength from which the beaten army could draw reinforcements. — Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Vers. 1, 2. And the chiefs of all the people formed themselves into a congregation of the People of God. The consciousness of an organic community is as yet fully alive in Israel. All the tribes were horrified at the crime in Benjamin. The necessity of conferring together is felt everywhere, from the north to the south. The natural representatives of the people (cf. on ch. i. 1) hasten to Mizpah, "to Jehovah," that is to say, at the invitation of the high-priest in the name of Jehovah, against whose holy law the crime was directed. For it may be assumed that whenever a popular movement, which has Jehovah for its centre, is spoken of, while no human personage as that of a Judge, is named, the priesthood was still the leading spiritual power. An עֵדָה, congregation, assembled itself, נִתְקַבְּלָה; or rather, was convoked, for קָבַל is the Greek καλέω, old Latin calare (i. e., curia calabra). It was formed of the heads<sup>1</sup> of the people who constituted themselves a "Congregation of the People of God."<sup>2</sup> רִאשֵׁיבָנֵי, from בָּנָה = בָּנָה, constituere). It is not by way of tautology that the narrator says: "the whole people, all the tribes"; for the fact is to be made prominent that, except Benjamin, not one tribe was wanting. The addition: "four hundred thousand men," explains why only the "heads" constitute the "congregation," namely, because the "People of God," as a whole, was too numerous. The number is mentioned with reference to ver. 10. Israel is still the warlike people which took possession of Canaan. The number of its sword-practiced warriors is the measure of its greatness. Those who assemble themselves here about "Jehovah," are the heads of a community of warriors (ecclesia militans.)

Ver. 3. And the sons of Benjamin heard that an assembly of the tribes took place in Mizpah. This Mizpah is probably the same as that which in Samuel's time also was the national gathering place (1 Sam. vii. 5), and which is regarded as represented by the Neby Samwil of the present day,<sup>1</sup> in the western part of the Benjamite territory. The Levite, the narrator informed us, divided his unhappy concubine into twelve parts, and sent them throughout all Israel. We must agree, therefore, with the Jewish expositors, who maintain that he sent a part to Benjamin also. It must likewise be assumed that Benjamin was invited to the council at Mizpah, both on account of the sense of national community which characterized the period, and because the assembly was summoned at a place within the borders of Benjamin. The tribe already manifested its partisan feeling in favor of Gibeah, when it "heard," indeed, of what was going on, but neither sent representatives to the assembly, nor gave any token whatever of indignation at the deed, or of desire to exculpate itself.

Vers. 4-7. And the man, the Levite, made answer. When the assembly proceeded to investigate the facts, the accuser only appeared; the accused were wanting. The speech of the Levite is remarkable in more respects than one. Of the aged Ephraimite who took him into his house, he makes no mention; for in order to a right judgment of the matter it is not necessary to consider whose guest he was, but that his right to hospitality has been violated. Hence he says, "they rose against me" (עלי); and, "they surrounded the house, עלי, on my account." The men in Gibeah had no designs against his host: he alone was the object of their attack. Nor does he speak of individuals in Gibeah, but of the "lords of Gibeah," as if the whole city were guilty; which inasmuch as it had not prevented the excess, was indeed true. His accusation, "they thought to murder me," is not literally in accordance with their intentions, because he is ashamed to speak of the matter by its right name. Moreover, the crime intended was worse than death, and submission to it punishable with disgrace and death. But he does not say that he himself delivered his concubine up into their hands, that they might treat her according to their lusts, instead of himself. And finally, he does not represent the violent deed as directed against an individual, but tells the assembled tribes that he cut the woman in pieces, and sent her throughout the whole country, because, as we already remarked above, it was a crime against all Israel. "Behold, all of you are sons of Israel." Without delay, he desires, that here and now, they consult, and that they separate not before they have formed a resolve. He fears lest otherwise the impression of the moment might wear off, and the crime be left unpunished.

Vers. 8 ff. And all the people arose. The people comprehend this, and unanimously proceed to action. Not one tribe shall be entrusted with the execution of the common resolve, but all shall take part in it, in order that the labor and odium may not fall on any one exclusively. The words וְאֵלֶּיךָ נִשְׁמָרָה, ver. 9, are to be regarded as parenthetical. The sense is that the executive army is to be selected out of the tribes, not by votes, but according to the lot. It is thought that the tenth part of Israel, or forty thousand men, will suffice; for these, who belong to all Israel, since they were raised out of the whole, provisions and equipments are to be supplied. This is looked to, in order that Israel may need no sustenance from Benjamin, while desolating its territory in war.

The words לְמִשְׁפַּחַת בְּנֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל remind us of ch.

vii. 8, where we have וְיָהֲרֹאֲשׁוּ אֶת-בְּנֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל, and make it probable that there also לָעַם should be read.

The expression, ver. 11, "and all the men of Israel were gathered together as one man חֲכָרִים," is to be understood of the army, which, forty thousand men strong, was gathered from all Israel as if no tribe distinctions existed. It was precisely in this perfect national unity and unanimity, that Israel sought its right to take the step it had in view. From the consciousness of this national character of the army, proceeded the effort to induce Benjamin to surrender the guilty, before the final resort to extreme measures. In the statement that "they sent into all the tribes of Benjamin," the expression, "tribes of Benjamin," forming as it were an antithesis to the "tribes of Israel," is peculiar. Properly speaking, there could not be "tribes" within a "tribe"; but since Benjamin formed an opposition camp, his "families" might be so named.

<sup>1</sup> [So Dr. Robinson, B. R. i. 460. Dean Stanley (Sin. and Pal. p. 212), claims Nebi-Samuel for the "high place" of Gibeon, and transfers Mizpah to Seopus (p. 222). The difficulty arising from the fact that in either case the assembly was held within the territorial limits of Benjamin, who nevertheless only "heard" of it, is met by Mr. Grove (Smith's Bible Dict., s. v. "Mizpah") by the apparently no less difficult supposition that the Mizpah of the present passage is to be located beyond the Jordan. — Ta.]

CHAPTER XX. 14-28.

14 But [And] the children [sons] of Benjamin gathered themselves together out of the cities unto Gibeah, to go out to battle against [with] the children [sons] of 15 Israel. And the children [sons] of Benjamin were numbered at that time out of the cities twenty and six thousand men that drew sword, beside the inhabitants of Gibeah, which were numbered seven hundred chosen men. Among all this people there were seven hundred chosen men left-handed; every one could sling stones at an hair-breadth, and not miss.<sup>1</sup> And the men of Israel, beside Benjamin, were numbered four hundred thousand men that drew sword: all these were men of war. And the children [sons] of Israel arose, and went up to the house of God [Beth-el], and asked counsel of God, and said, Which of us shall go up<sup>2</sup> first to the battle against [with] the children [sons] of Benjamin? And the Lord [Jehovah] said, Judah shall go up first. And the children [sons] of Israel rose up in the morning, and encamped against Gibeah. And the men of Israel went out to battle against [with] Benjamin; and the men of Israel put themselves in array to fight against [with] them at Gibeah. And the children [sons] of Benjamin came [went] forth out of Gibeah, and destroyed [slain] down to the ground of the Israelites that day twenty and two thousand men. And [But] the people, the men of Israel, encouraged themselves [took courage], and set their battle again in array in the place where they put themselves in array the first day. (And the children [sons] of Israel went up and wept before the Lord [Jehovah] until even, and asked counsel of the Lord [Jehovah], saying, Shall I go up [advance] again to battle against [with] the children [sons] of Benjamin my brother? And the Lord [Jehovah] said, Go up against him.) And the children [sons] of Israel came near against the children [sons] of Benjamin the second day. And Benjamin went forth against them out of Gibeah the second day, and destroyed [slain] down to the ground of the children [sons] of Israel again eighteen thousand men; all these drew the sword. Then all the children [sons] of Israel, and all the people, went up, and came unto the house of God [Beth-el], and wept, and sat there before the Lord [Jehovah], and fasted that day until even, and offered burnt-offerings and peace-offerings before the Lord [Jehovah]. And the children [sons] of Israel inquired of the Lord [Jehovah], (for the ark of the covenant of God was there in those days, And Phinehas, the son of Eleazar, the son of Aaron, stood before it in those days,) saying, Shall I yet again go out to battle against [with] the children [sons] of Benjamin my brother, or shall I cease? And the Lord [Jehovah] said, Go up; for to-morrow I will deliver them into thine hand.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

1 Ver. 16. — מִיָּמִין, from מִיָּמִין, to miss, whence מִיָּמִין, a miss, failure, sin. The Greek ἀμαρτία is explained in a similar way (cf. Ernesti, die Theorie vom Ursprung der Sünde, p. 10, where the reference to our passage, however, must not be suffered to mislead, as if the substantive מִיָּמִין were read).

2 Ver. 18. — יֵצֵא לָנוּ: "Who shall go up for us." Compare "Textual and Grammatical," note 2, on ch. i. 1. — Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

The tribe of Benjamin refuses to confess its guilt, and to surrender the guilty. Defiant and warlike of spirit, it prefers to run the risks of war. It builds its hopes on the unwieldiness of the national organization, on differences of opinion, on partisan sympathies in its favor, and on the lack of inclination to war, especially to a war waged against a brother-tribe. It hopes, therefore, notwithstanding the great preponderance of force on the other side, to maintain its ground. And it is certain that by reason of the divisions of great confederacies (like the German), many a small government has often maintained itself in defiance and resistance. Thus also in antiquity, the Phocian town of Crissa, having injured Delphi and therewith wronged the national sanctuary of the Greeks, and being charged with other moral delinquencies,<sup>1</sup> thought nevertheless to be able to defend itself against the executionary army of the Amphictyonic Council. And it succeeded in a degree. The war, waged against the unaided city by the Thessalians, Athenians, and Sicyonians, assisted by the wisdom of Solon, lasted ten years. It was ended at last by an oracular response and a stratagem of war, as in the case of the war with Benjamin (Paus. x. 37). John Frederick the Intermediate, of Gotha, likewise, expected to be able to maintain himself on his Gibeah, the Grimenstein, in order to protect Grumbach, despite all his sins, against the ban of the German Empire; but, like Benjamin, he had to succumb before his brethren (of Saxony. Cf. Beck, Gesch. Joh. Fried. des Mittleren, i. 518). A similar war was that waged by the States of North America, in which the South defended itself like Benjamin, and with even greater success, albeit that the motives of the conflict were less manifest than they were at Gibeah.

Benjamin, however, would certainly have given up all thought of resistance, if the singular exposition were correct, which makes all the 400,000 men of Israel to proceed against Gibeah of Benjamin. This tribe numbered 26,700 men fit for military service. That the whole of this force is at once brought into the field is a matter easily explained, seeing they are about to enter on a desperate war. But that all the 400,000 men of all Israel appeared within the limited district of Gibeah, is both in itself and strategically improbable. The renewed mention of this number in ver. 17, is only designed to point out the enormous superiority of Israel in the means of war; just as to indicate the superior strength of Prussia over Denmark, it has doubtless happened that persons have spoken of the 500,000 men at the command of the Prussian state. But it surely could not occur that those 500,000 should all be sent against Schleswig. Nor is there anything in our narrative to require a different conclusion with reference to the 400,000 of Israel. On the contrary, we have, as above explained, the definite statement that 40,000 men were chosen for the war against Benjamin, which still left the advantage of numbers with the national army. The expositors, in considering ver. 9, have overlooked the fact that the purpose for which the lot was used is fully described in ver. 10; that the mere business of procuring provisions was not of such a nature as to demand such exactness of statement; that further, לְעֶשְׂרֵת (ver. 12) stands perfectly parallel with לְעֶשְׂרֵת (ver. 13), and that therefore the tenth part was levied for the purpose of executing judgment on Benjamin. It is also well known that the expression "sons of Israel," in ver. 19, stands not only for all the tribes, but is used in all the war narratives we have hitherto considered, of single tribes as well. Should it be objected, that especially according to Biblical narratives, the defeat of great armies by small ones is not an unheard of thing, it must be admitted that this is indeed true. But whenever this occurred in Biblical narratives, the victors had the cause of God and of truth on their side. And whenever that was the case—and it may perhaps be assumed to have been the case in the battle of Marathon also—the victory was of so decisive a character as to admit of no comparison with the ultimately useless successes of Benjamin. Gibeah means "height;" and victory remained with the Benjamites, as long as they kept their position on the elevated points. But what specially proves that the narrator views the army of Israel as composed of 40,000 men, is the circumstance that in the first engagement 22,000, and in the second, 18,000, together exactly 40,000, were put hors de combat. He mentions this to show that the assurance which Israel felt that a tenth part of its forces were enough to settle with Benjamin, was not justified in the event. Properly speaking, they are only ten tribes who confront Benjamin; and 40,000 are the tenth part of their available military strength: it costs, therefore, the military capacity of what, in a certain sense, is a tribe, before a tribe like Benjamin succumbs. The losses indicate, as we shall point out farther on, that Israel's cause in this war was by no means a perfectly pure one.

Vers. 14-17. And the sons of Benjamin gathered themselves together out of their districts unto Gibeah. Expositors have taken offense here at the word בְּנֵי־יִשְׂרָאֵל, as if the Benjamites had only lived in cities; but the narrator designs to state that the fighting men of Benjamin assembled themselves from all the regions assigned to the tribe at Gibeah, as a fixed point of rendezvous, and at the same time for the purpose of protecting this city, as the special object of attack, against the other tribes. The number, also, here given of the tribe, 26,700, appeared to many not to harmonize with the subsequent enumeration of 25,700 men (vers. 35, 47). But it would have been surprising, indeed, if after two engagements, in which the enemy lost 40,000 men, none of Benjamin's men had been found wanting. Accordingly, the corrections suggested even as anciently as the Septuagint and Josephus, are less credible than this natural difference between the beginning and the end of the war. Of the 26,700, only 700 belonged to Gibeah,—a statement which is made for the purpose of testifying to the strong sense of community, through which the whole tribe takes up the cause of these few. The connection of ver. 16 with the preceding is perfectly clear. It states expressly that in the entire host (כָּל־הָעָם), there were 700 left-handed persons (cf. on these at ch. iii. 15), who were skillful slingers. This number has nothing to do with the 700 of ver. 15. Since the Benjamites defended themselves from the heights, the far-throwing slingers were of special value. They were slingers, perhaps, because they were left-handed. According to the Cyropædia, Cyrus caused all who were incapable of bearing other arms to exercise themselves in slinging. The Persians were fond of using slingers (Brisson, p. 658). The friend of the younger Cyrus, Mithridates, had four hundred slingers, "exceedingly light and active" (Anab. iii. 3, 6). The Rhodian slingers threw leaden plummets to a great distance. The Achæans struck any part of the body at which they aimed.<sup>1</sup> That skill in slinging was not confined to Benjamin, is evident from David's victory over Goliath. What a terrible weapon the sling could be, is demonstrated by the narrative of Livy concerning the Balearians, who hurled such a quantity of stones, like thickest hail showers, on the approaching Carthaginian fleet, as to prevent them from casting anchor (xxviii. 37).

Ver. 18. And the sons of Israel arose, and went up to Bethel, and inquired of God (יִשְׂרָאֵלִים). It is Jehovah who answers, but their inquiry was addressed to Elohim. It is no wonder that they suffered a defeat. For they approach God without sorrow because they are obliged to fight against a brother tribe, without repentance for their own sins, and without sacrifices. It is thus that heathen inquire of their Elohim, just as oracles were consulted from a desire to know the future. Nor do they ask whether they should advance, whether they shall conquer—that they regard as certain—but who shall first attack. The answer was: "Judah shall go up first." It conforms in scope to their inquiry. They have not inquired concerning victory; hence, the answer contains nothing to inform them on this head. Had any other tribe but Judah been named, that might have been interpreted into an assurance of victory; for Judah always marched at the head (cf. on ch. i. 2). Judah's leading on the present occasion is, therefore, only in accordance with the common rule. The divine response abstains from giving any information beyond what the inquiry called for. This circumstance might have been a warning to them, had they been less certain. But does not the inquiry and its answer countenance the opinion that all the troops of all the tribes (400,000 men) were encamped before Gibeah? But in that case, we would have to suppose, in accordance with the analogy of ch. i. 2, that Judah began the conflict alone, which is against the whole narrative. On the contrary, the question rather serves to show that the 40,000 represented all Israel on a decimated scale; that they were not chosen according to tribes, but by the lot, out of the whole people. Consequently, the internal relations of this army differed from what they would have been, had the selection been according to tribes. Hence arose the question: Who shall take the lead in this army? God replies: "Judah, — as always"; and leaves every other question undetermined.

(גִּבְעָה), they formed a מִצְעָקָה, an acies, cf. on ch. vi. 26), but the untrustworthy character of their generalship demonstrates itself thereby. Without a definite plan of attack and of the war, they dispose themselves before the city, and hope thereby to terrify the threatened tribe. But the latter falls upon them, and institutes a great destruction among them. The text says: וַיִּשְׁחָדוּם בְּיָשָׁרָאֵל. The word שָׁחַד is not only to kill, but also to wound, and to disable for war.

It is to be assumed, as a matter of course, although it is not stated, that after this first engagement, and again, after the second, some time elapsed before a renewal of hostilities took place. It was unnecessary to state a fact that lay in the nature of the case. The troops were reinforced after the first defeat, although no thought was as yet entertained of adopting a different battle-plan, by which the enemy might be drawn away from his favorable position on the height. They determined, however, not to await an attack this time, as formerly, but to make one (וַיִּתְּקוּ, vers. 24); for this is the meaning of תָּקַח (to advance at a rapid march), when used of movements in war. But, more important still, they begin to lose their self-righteous assurance. They go to Bethel, and weep there. They see how lamentable it is, to fight against their brethren, and lose thousands of lives in such a war. They begin to doubt whether their cause be a good one; and hence they inquire not now of an Elohim, after the manner of the heathen, but of their Elohim, Jehovah. The answer says: "Go up," but gives no promise of victory. In this way, the battle is renewed, — not on the next day after the former, but for the second time. They still fail to conquer Gibeah: the attack is repulsed, and the loss, though not as great as before, is yet terribly large.

The divine reply, "Go up," was not a deception of the people, but was grounded in the sad necessity of chastizing both parts of the warring nation.

1 (How came the ark to be at Bethel, if the one national sanctuary was at Shiloh? Hengstenberg (Kell) also replies that it was brought from Shiloh to Bethel during the war.

Had the answer been, "Go not up," Israel would have abandoned the war, and Benjamin would have been hardened in the pride of successful resistance. Israel, on the other hand, by going up and experiencing defeat, would again be brought nearer to the right spirit, which alone insures victory in Israel. Accordingly, in ver. 26 this spirit manifests itself. Proceeding to Bethel, they no longer merely weep there, and lament over the calamity of waging war on their brethren at such fearful sacrifices, but they abide in prayer and fasting. It is a sign of the penitence which they feel on account of their own sins. Hitherto, they had fought against Benjamin under a feeling of their own superior virtue, as if among their opponents there had been only sinners, among themselves none but Israelites without guile. Theirs was an exhibition of Pharisaism, which modern history also carries on all its pages, in which there is much to be read of "moral indignation," but very little of "righteous self-knowledge" and repentance. Through the command of Lev. xxiii. 26-32, concerning the day of atonement, on which all nourishment was to be withheld from the body, fasting became in Israel the sign of confession of sin and repentance. The word צָוַם occurs here for the first time: in the Books of Samuel it is the ordinary term. The great victory of Samuel over the Philistines is also preceded by a fast (1 Sam. vii. 6). The signification of the word resembles that of

(וַיִּצְוֶם), a fast, from צָוַם (Lev. xxiii. 27: וַיִּצְוֶם) oppressit, domuit, and is etymologically connected with the Sanskrit dam, damāṣ, domare, to tame. The Sanskrit prāja, to fast, is in like manner explained as meaning "to restrain one's self" (cf. Benfey, Gr. Gram. ii. 202). — Israel now performs what it had formerly neglected: it brings burnt-offerings and peace-offerings — the burnt-offerings as penitential offerings for the past, as in ch. vi. 26 ff; the peace-offerings as votive offerings with reference to the future (Lev. vii. 16). The Jewish expositors have a beautiful explanation. They derive שָׁלָמִים from שָׁלוֹם, peace. The last word of the law concerning sacrifices in Lev. vii. is שָׁלָמִים (ver. 37); and peace, say they, is the close of every holy life (cf. my Irene, p. 37.)

In vers. 27 and 28, the words: "for the ark . . . those days," form a parenthetical intercalation, which, as we shall point out below, is of importance in determining the time to which the events belong. After repentance and sacrifices, Israel inquires now for the third time of the Urim and Thummim; and now only, when they who inquire are in the right frame of mind, and receive a full and favorable reply, is the statement inserted that the ark of the covenant was at Bethel,<sup>1</sup> and that Phinehas, the grandson of Aaron, was the high-priest. And now the answer is not simply "Go up," but conveys the assurance, "to-morrow will I give victory into thine hand."

For his arguments, see Pentateuch, II. 37-39, Ryland's edition. For our author's explanation, see the "Concluding Note," on p. 259. — Tr.]

CHAPTER XX. 29-48.

- 29 30 And Israel set liers in wait round about Gibeah. And the children [sons] of Israel went up against the children [sons] of Benjamin on the third day, and put 31 themselves in array against Gibeah, as at other times. And the children [sons] of Benjamin went out against the people, and were [thus] drawn away from the city; and they began to smite of the people, and kill,<sup>1</sup> as at other times, in the highways, of which one goeth up to the house of God [Beth-el], and the other to Gibeah in 32 the field, about thirty men of Israel. And the children [sons] of Benjamin said, They are smitten down [omit: down] before us, as at the first. But the children [sons] of Israel said, Let us flee, and draw them from the city unto the highways.
33 And all the men of Israel rose up out of their place, and put themselves in array at Baal-tamar: and the liers in wait of Israel came forth [also] out of their places
34 [place], even out of the meadows [naked fields]<sup>2</sup> of Gibeah. And there [they] came against<sup>3</sup> Gibeah ten thousand chosen men out of all Israel, and the battle 35 [there] was sore: but they [i. e. the Benjamites] knew not that evil was near them. And the Lord [Jehovah] smote Benjamin before Israel: and the children [sons] of Israel destroyed of the Benjamites that day twenty and five thousand and an hundred men: all these drew the sword.
- 36 So [Now] the children [sons] of Benjamin saw that they [the sons of Israel] were smitten:<sup>4</sup> for the men of Israel gave place to the Benjamites, because they trusted 37 unto the liers in wait which they had set beside [against] Gibeah. And the liers in wait hastened, and rushed upon Gibeah; and the liers in wait drew themselves
38 along,<sup>5</sup> and smote all the city with the edge of the sword. Now there was [omit: there was] an [the] appointed sign between the men of Israel and the liers in wait [was], that they should make a great flame [cloud—lit. elevation, rising] with [of]
39 smoke rise up<sup>6</sup> out of the city. But when [omit: when] the men of Israel retired in the battle, [and] Benjamin began to smite and kill of the men of Israel about thirty persons: for they said, Surely they are smitten down [omit: down]
40 before us, as in the first battle. And when the flame [cloud—cf. ver. 38] began to arise up out of the city with [omit: with] a pillar of smoke, the Benjamites looked behind them, and behold, the flame [whole] of the city ascended up [in flames, or smoke]
41 to heaven. And when [omit: when] the men of Israel turned again, [and] the men of Benjamin were amazed [confounded]: for they saw that evil was come 42 upon them. Therefore they turned their backs before the men of Israel unto the way of the wilderness; but the battle overtook [or, pursued after] them; and them
43 which came out of the cities they destroyed in the midst of them.<sup>7</sup> Thus [omit: Thus] they [They] inclosed the Benjamites round about, and chased them, and trode them down with ease [at their place of rest,] over against [as far as before] Gibeah
44 toward the sun-rising [on the east,]<sup>8</sup> And there fell of Benjamin eighteen thousand men; all these were men of valour. And they turned and fled toward the wilderness unto the rock of Rimmon: and they gleaned of them in the highways five thousand men; and pursued hard after them unto Gidom, and slew two thousand men [more] of them. So that all which fell that day of Benjamin were twenty 47 and five thousand men that drew the sword; all these were men of valour. But six hundred men turned and fled to the wilderness unto the rock Rimmon, and abode in the rock Rimmon four months. And the men of Israel turned again upon [returned unto] the children [sons] of Benjamin, and smote them with the edge of the sword, as well the men of every city,<sup>9</sup> as the beast [cattle], and all that came to hand [was found]: also they set on fire all the cities that they came to [that were found].

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 31. — וַיִּחְלוּ לְהַפּוֹת מִהֶעָם חֲלָלִים: "and they began to smite of the people, slain;" i. e., they smote so that the smitten became slain. חֲלָלִים is the accusative of closer definition. Dr. Cassel takes it as nom. native: "They began to smite, (so that,) as at the former times, slain of the people were [i. e., lay] on the highways, of which one," etc. Similarly in ver. 39. — Tr.]

[2 Ver. 33. — מִצָּרָה. Dr. Cassel: Beweis, "nakedness"; cf. his remarks below. The Peshito read מִצָּרָה, a cave; the LXX. in Cod. Alex., and the Vulgate, מִצָּרָב, "from the west." Fürst (in his Lexicon) defines מִצָּרָה as "forest," and derives it from a conjectural root צָרַח III., to sprout thickly, to which he also assigns the participle in Pa. xxxvii. 35. Keil seeks to remove the difficulty of connecting the ambushade with an open, treeless plain, by remarking that "the words of the text do not require us to suppose that the forestless region was the place of hiding, but may be so understood as to affirm that the ambushade, having broken up from its hiding-place, advanced against the city from the forestless region." But he has failed to notice that the participle מִצָּרָה speaks precisely of the "breaking forth," and leaves the idea of "advancing on the city" entirely unexpressed. — Tr.]

[3 Ver. 34. — וַיִּבְאֵהוּ מִפְּנֵי גִבְעָה: "from before Gibeah." Dr. Cassel, like the E. V., has "against." Bertheau says: "The ambushade, consisting of ten thousand chosen men, came 'from straight before' Gibeah; whither they came, is not stated, but from the connection it appears that they attacked the Benjamites, who were fighting at some distance from the city, in the rear." Keil adopts the same explanation. But it is manifest from vers. 37, 38, and especially vers. 40 and 41, that Bertheau and Keil are wrong, and the E. V. and our author right. — Tr.]

[4 Ver. 36. — וַיִּירָא בְנֵי־בְנִימִן עַיִן נֶגְפָה. With this verse, a new and more detailed account of the conflict begins. So Bertheau, Keil, and Bunsen, as well as our author. To indicate this to the eye, we have introduced a new paragraph division into the text. Bertheau and Bunsen agree with our author that the subject of וַיִּירָא is "the sons of Israel." According to Keil, "the sons of Benjamin saw that they were smitten, and that the men of Israel only gave way before them because they depended on the ambushade which they had laid against Gibeah. They became aware of this when the ambushade fell on their rear." But this is inconsistent with ver. 37, and certainly with ver. 40. Ver. 36 is a restatement of ver. 32, introductory to the detailed account that now follows. — Tr.]

[5 Ver. 37. — וַיִּמְשֹׁךְ. Dr. Cassel translates: "and the ambushade overpowered and smote the whole city;" and adds in a foot-note: "In the sense of Job xiv. 22: מִשְׁחָה אֲבִירִים בְּכֹחוֹ." But there the word probably means "to hold fast, to preserve," cf. Delitzsch in locum. It seems better to take it here in the sense "to march, advance," cf. ch. iv. 6. — Tr.]

[6 Ver. 38. — חָרַב לְחַצְלוֹתָם. The first of these words being taken as the apocopated hiphil imperative, a mixture of the direct with the indirect address arises from the suffix of the third person in the second word. Dr. Cassel avoids this by declaring חָרַב to be an apocopated infinitive (see below); but it is better to admit the existence of a grammatical inaccuracy. — Tr.]

[7 Ver. 42. — וַאֲשֶׁר מִחֻצֹּתֵיהֶם מִשְׁחִיתֵיהֶם אוֹתוֹ בְּתוֹכֹה. Dr. Cassel translates: "and they of the cities (through which Benjamin came) destroyed them in the midst of them." Compare the exegetical remarks. Keil: "The words וַאֲשֶׁר מִחֻצֹּתֵיהֶם can only be an appositional explanation of the suffix in וַיִּמְשֹׁךְ, in the sense: Benjamin, namely, they who out of the cities of Benjamin had come to the aid of Gibeah (cf. vers. 14 f), i. e., all Benjamites. The following וַיִּמְשֹׁךְ is a circumstantial clause illustrative of the preceding חָרַב: 'in that they (the men of Israel) destroyed him (Benjamin) in the midst of it.' The singular suffix in בְּתוֹכֹה, refers not to Benjamin — for that yields no tolerable sense — but to the preceding חָרַב: 'in the midst of the way to the desert.'" ]

[8 Ver. 43. — This verse continues the description begun in ver. 42, by means of an animated constructio asyndeta. וַיִּתְּנוּ אֹתוֹ בְּיָמָיו, they surrounded Benjamin (by throwing out bodies of men on his flanks); וַיִּדְרִיכּוּהוּ, pursued after him; וַיִּפְּחוּהוּ, fell upon and trode him down at his resting-place (that is, when, exhausted, he halted to take breath — מִנְתַּחָה, accusative of place); and this pursuit and slaughter continued until the pursuers, who started from some distance north of Gibeah (ver. 31), had come south "as far as before Gibeah on its eastern side." There the remnant of the pursued found means to turn northward again, ver. 45; and were again pursued as far as Gidom (a place evidently somewhere between east of Gibeah and Rimmon). Compare our author's remarks below, which, however, indicate a slightly different conception on some points. — Tr.]

[9 Ver. 43. — מִכָּל מֵצָאָהּ. Dr. Cassel renders: "everything of the city, to the cattle and whatever else was found;" and adds the following note: "Many MSS., and the more recent expositors, point מֵצָאָהּ, men, and yet it cannot be said that with וַיִּפְּחוּהוּ, this forms an altogether suitable antithesis, inasmuch as it still fails to express the idea that everything was put under the ban of destruction. The pointing מֵצָאָהּ finds support in Josh. viii. 24; x. 20, where similar destructions עֲרִידָתָם are spoken of." — Tr.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Vers. 29 ff. From the determined purpose of the ten tribes to prosecute the war, Benjamin should have taken occasion to yield. Since Israel continued firm, notwithstanding severe losses, it might have concluded that it was impossible to resist permanently. It might also have observed that another spirit animated this second war, and that Israel had become thoroughly in earnest to complete the work it had taken in hand. Another interval of time had manifestly passed by. After the dissolution of the first army, Israel had to levy a new one (illustrative examples of this may be found in the North American Union war). Accordingly, the first engagements are spoken of together, as the "former" or the "first" war (vers. 32 and 39). The tribes of Israel now first conclude to use strategic arts. This circumstance incidentally affords data which enable us to obtain a somewhat clearer idea of the theatre of the war. Gibeah lay high; the attack of the Israelites came from the direction of Bethel, i. e., from the Northwest. Two highways are mentioned, along which the sons of Benjamin advanced to meet the assailants—one leading to Bethel, the other to "Gibeah-in-the-Field" (a Lower, or Field-Gibeah in contrast with the Higher, or Mountain-Gibeah). The Israelites allure the Benjamites, rendered unwary by former successes, farther and farther away from the heights and the city. It is expressly said that Benjamin went out "to meet them" (לִקְרַאתָם, ver. 31). They offer scarcely any resistance, but retreat, constantly followed by Benjamin, who already sees the triumphs of the first two battle days reenacted (ver. 32). Not until they have reached Baal Tamar,<sup>1</sup> doubtless at a suitable distance from Gibeah, do they halt, and wait for the prearranged signal from other divisions who lay in ambush, and who were to attack the city as soon as the Benjamites should leave it. The place from which the city is thus suddenly attacked, is called מַעְרֵה־בַּעַל (ver. 33).

The Masora has pointed מַעְרֵה, evidently deriving the word from מַעַרְה, to be naked, and intending to express by it, as Raschi also explains, the "nakedness" of Gibeah, i. e., its accessible part. The Targum renders it by מַיִשֶׁר; the same term by which it constantly renders מַעְרֵה, so that possibly it may have read מַעְרֵה־בַּעַל.<sup>2</sup> It might then be understood of the point where the hill slopes down to the plain, and thus becomes more accessible. The simplest way would be to point so as to read מַעְרֵה, a cave, as the Septuagint also seems to do: Μααργεβα (instead of Μαπαργεβί). North of the present Jeba, with which our Gibeah is held to be identical, runs the Wady es-Suweinit. It comes from Beitin and el-Birch, to the Northwest, and, after passing Jeba, runs between high precipices, in one of which is a large cavern called Jaiyah (Rob. i. 441).

Vers. 34, 35. And they came against Gibeah, ten thousand men. We now first learn the numerical strength of the ambushade, the placing of which was stated in ver. 29. It is scarcely necessary to point out that we have here another fact going to show the improbability of a besieging army of 400,000, who could have surrounded the whole of Gibeah on all sides. Verses 34 and 35, while telling about the ambushade, take occasion briefly to indicate the result of the whole war, according to what, as Keil justly observes, is a characteristic practice of Hebrew historiography. This is followed, vers. 36 ff., by the more detailed account derived from ancient notes. Nor is there any discrepancy between ver. 35, which states that there fell 25,100 men of Benjamin, and ver. 46, which gives the number at 25,000. The latter is only the sum total of the three round numbers of vers. 44 and 45, namely, 18,000 + 5,000 + 2,000; and the great fidelity of the report shows itself in the fact that since the hundred over 25,000 is not divided between the round sums, it is also not included in the sum total, although according to ver. 35 its inclusion was only a matter of course. The artifice employed by the Israelites against the Benjamites, was in a different way also used against Shechem by Abimelech. Similar stratagems, practiced by Scipio, Hannibal, and others, are collected by Frontinus (Stratagematicon, lib. iii. cap. 10). Scipio besieged a city in Sardinia, feigned to take to flight before the besieged, and when they thoughtlessly followed him, per eos, quos in proximo occultaverat, oppidum invasit.

Ver. 26. For the sons of Benjamin had thought that they were smitten. The "they" of this sentence refers to the Israelites, as appears from the succeeding words. The verse is a recapitulation of verso 32, and is therefore to be rendered by the pluperfect: "they had seen or thought." They actually had seen, that the sons of Israel allowed themselves to be smitten.

Ver. 38. And the appointed sign between the men of Israel and the liars in wait was, that they should cause a great cloud of smoke to rise up out of the city. The form הָרֶבֶב (הָרֶבֶב) is explained by the phrase הָרֶבֶב (הָרֶבֶב), Ps. li. 4, where the keri has הָרֶבֶב. For not the imperative only, but precisely the infinitive, which forms it (both הָרֶבֶב), is also apocopated into הָרֶבֶב, and takes in consequence the adverbial signification, "strongly," "very," "fully."

The word is quite essential to the full understanding of the sentence. The men of the ambushade are to cause a great pillar of smoke, like that of a burning city, to ascend, such as could not fail to be visible at a distance, and could not be mistaken. Bertheau must have overlooked this, when he proposed to remove the word out of the text.<sup>3</sup>

Vers. 42 ff. And the inhabitants of the cities destroyed them in the midst of them. The men of Benjamin fled; and in flight passed through the cities that lay in their course. Thereupon the inhabitants of these cities also arise, and slay the fugitives in their midst. The same thing occurs in all wars, when disorganized, fugitive troops must pass through the enemy's land.<sup>4</sup> Other expla-

<sup>4</sup> (But on this occasion the fugitives do not pass through the enemy's land. From first to last, whether fighting or nations, such as have been given from time immemorial, do not appear to harmonize with the connection and the language. The clause cannot refer to those who burned the city; for how could they be called "אֲשֶׁר מִחֲקָרִים"? Equally incomprehensible is the reason for using this expression, and the בְּרוּכוֹ connected with it, if Bertheau's explanation, which Keil has mostly followed, be adopted; for the pursuit and inclosure are first delineated in ver. 43. The explanation of Le Clerc appears to me to come nearest the sense: Cum confugerunt Benjaminitæ ad urbes aliorum Israëlitarum, ab iis occidebantur. Only, this must not be understood of a systematic application for refuge on the part of the Benjamites; but of the natural phenomenon that against a pursued and smitten foe everything rises up. The narrator evidently points in this way to the embittered feelings against Benjamin which everywhere prevailed. In proportion to Benjamin's former overbearing haughtiness, is his present experience of misery. Not only is the hostile army continually at his heels, but he meets with enemies everywhere. Only the wilderness, which he endeavors to reach by fleeing in an eastern and northeastern direction toward the Jordan, promises safety. But before he arrives there, divisions of his men are cut off and surrounded (בְּתִיבָה, ver. 43). The pursuit is unceasing (this is the sense of חֲרִידֵיהֶם מִנְּחָה, "they chase his rest," hence probably the hiphil); he scarcely thinks to be able to take breath for a moment, before they are behind him again: in this way he is driven until he finds himself within the limits of the wilderness east of Gibeah. Finally, still pursued as far as an unknown place called Gidom, a remnant of his shattered hosts finds an asylum in the rock Rimmon, northeast of Gibeah and below Ophra, for the modern Rummôn, lying high, on a rocky Tell, on the north side of the great Wady el-'Asas, is held to be the rock Rimmon of our narrative (Rob. iii. 290; ii. 440).

Six hundred men of the whole tribe saved themselves on that rock. All the rest fell slain by the hands of brethren. They owed their safety to the eagerness of their pursuers to turn back, and destroy everything belonging to Benjamin, cities, houses, and herds. The cities are put under the ban and burned, like Jericho and other cities of the enemy. The Israelites are even more severe in their treatment of Benjamin, than the Pythia was toward the hostile Crissa, which was to be "warred on by day and by night and be made desolate, and whose inhabitants were to become slaves." But grief and regret did not fail to come.

fleeing, Benjamin moves on his own soil within his own boundaries; and this fact makes our author's explanation of the last clause of ver. 42 impossible. Cf. note 7 under "Textual and Grammatical." — TL.]

Israel bewails the desolation of Benjamin, and takes measures to preserve the tribe from extinction. Twelve thousand men are sent to punish Jabesh-Gilead for not joining in the war against Benjamin, and to take their daughters for wives for the remaining Benjamites.

CHAPTER XXI. 1-14.

- 1 Now the men of Israel had sworn in Mizpeh [Mizpah], saying, There shall not
- 2 any of us give his daughter unto Benjamin to wife. And the people came to the house of God [Beth-el], and abode [sat] there till even before God, and lifted up
- 3 their voices, and wept sore; And said, O Lord [Jehovah,] God of Israel, why is this come to pass in Israel, that there should be to-day one tribe lacking in Israel?
- 4 And it came to pass on the morrow, that the people rose early, and built there an
- 5 altar, and offered burnt-offerings, and peace-offerings. And the children [sons] of Israel said, Who is there among all the tribes of Israel that came not up with [in] the congregation unto the Lord [Jehovah]? For they had made a great oath concerning him that came not up to the Lord [Jehovah] to Mizpeh, saying, He shall
- 6 surely be put to death. And the children [sons] of Israel repented them for Benjamin their brother, and said, There is one tribe cut off from Israel this day. How shall we do for wives for them that remain, seeing we have sworn by the Lord [Jehovah], that we will not give them of our daughters to wives? And they said, What one is there of the tribes of Israel that came not up to Mizpeh to the Lord [Jehovah]? and behold, there came none to the camp from Jabesh-gilead to the
- 9 assembly. For the people were numbered [mustered], and behold there were none
- 10 of the inhabitants of Jabesh-gilead there. And the congregation sent thither twelve thousand men of the valiantest, and commanded them, saying, Go and smite the inhabitants of Jabesh-gilead with the edge of the sword, with the women and the
- 11 children. And this is the thing that ye shall do, Ye shall utterly destroy every
- 12 male, and every woman that hath lain by man. And they found among the inhabitants of Jabesh-gilead four hundred young [women,] virgins[,] that had known no man by lying with any male: and they brought them unto the camp to Shiloh, which is in the land of Canaan. And the whole congregation sent some to speak to the children [sons] of Benjamin that were in the rock Rimmon, and to call peaceably unto them [and offered (the called) peace to them]. And Benjamin came again [returned] at that time; and they gave them wives [the women] which they had saved alive of the women of Jabesh-gilead: and yet so they sufficed them not [but they found not for them so many].<sup>1</sup>

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¶ Ver. 14. — וְלִי־תִזְכָּר לָהֶם כֵּן. Here, as in Ex. x. 14, כֵּן means et; and, in general, it answers to tantum, tantus, tot, where to "so" we add the appropriate adjective.

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Vers. 1-4. Now the men of Israel had sworn in Mizpah. Our author now informs us, by way of supplementing the preceding narrative, of two oaths taken by the congregation at the beginning of the war. All Israel promised, man by man (hence the expression יִשְׂרָאֵל יָדָא, that they would not give their daughters as wives to any men of Benjamin. They abrogated the connubium (the right of intermarriage) with the tribe. They determined to treat Benjamin as a heathen people, or as heathen nations, in the absence of special treaties (strayaala), were accustomed to look upon each other. There were instances of heathen tribes who did not at all intermix. Such cases were found among Germanic tribes also, until Christianity had fully conquered them. It was the church that brought East-Goths and West-Goths, Anglo-Saxons and Britons, Franks and Romans, to look upon each other as tribes of one Israel. Very great, therefore, must have been the indignation of the collective Israel, when they thus, as it were, cast Benjamin out of their marriage covenant. The Romans once (335 B. C.) punished certain rebellious Latin tribes by depriving them of the privileges of connubia, commercia, et concilia (Liv. viii. 14). The Latins were subject tribes: Benjamin, a brother-tribe with equal rights. It might be thought that such a resolve was of itself sufficient to punish Benjamin for its immorality. But is it not probable that in that case, the tribe, through its stubbornness, would have sunk altogether into heathenism? It must be admitted, however, that double punishment was too severe. For it was to punish the guilty, not to destroy a tribe, that Israel had taken the field. This they now perceive—but too late—after their passionate exasperation has subsided. They now sit before the altar of God in Bethel, weeping over the calamity that has taken place. The consequences of their unmeasured severity are now perceived. To what purpose this utter destruction by the sword of everything that pertained to the brother tribe? When Benjamin took to flight, would it not have sufficed then once more to demand of him the surrender of the guilty? Would he still have resisted, when, helpless, he sought the wilderness for refuge? To what purpose the slaughter of the flying? the indiscriminate use of sword and fagot in the cities? Israel has cause for weeping; for it feels the horrors of civil war. Humanity and kindness are frightened away when brethren war with brethren. The worst and most detestable crimes are committed against nations by themselves, under the influence of foolish self-deception, when they fall victims to internal strife. The exasperation of the feelings puts moral causes entirely out of sight. Leaders, says Tacitus, are then less valued than soldiers (Hist. ii. 29, 6: "civilibus bellis plus militibus, quam ducibus licere"). Israel may bewail itself before God, but it cannot accuse its leaders. The Urim and Thummim approved the punishment of Benjamin, but not the oaths and cruelty with which it was accompanied. However, if Israel in this war furnishes an illustrative instance of the results to which defiant obstinacy (on the side of Benjamin), and fanatical, self-exasperating zeal (on the side of the ten tribes), may lead, it is also instructive to note that it knows that such doings must be repented of. It builds an altar, and, as before the war, brings burnt-offerings and peace-offerings, the first expressive of penitence for the past, the other of vows for the future.

Vers. 5 ff. For they had made a great oath concerning whoever came not up to Jehovah at Mizpah, saying, He shall surely be put to death. Israel here also again clearly shows in its history, what every man may observe in his own experience: that repentance and vows, with reference to past precipitate sin, have scarcely been expressed, before the same thing is done again, and frequently with the same blind zeal which was just before lamented. At that time, when indignation at the outrage in Gibeah filled all hearts, an oath was also taken that every city in Israel that did not send its messengers to the national assembly, consequently took no part in the general proceeding against Benjamin, which was the cause of God, should be devoted to destruction. Such a city was considered to make itself, to a certain extent, an ally of Benjamin, and to be not sufficiently disturbed by the outrageous misdeed, to give assurance that it did not half approve of it. Amid the terrible events of the war, it had been neglected to ascertain whether all cities had sent messengers; it is only now, when the question how to help Benjamin up again without violating the oath, is considered, that the absence of messengers from Jabesh-Gilead is brought to light. And what is it proposed to do? To deal with that city as they have just lamented to have dealt with Benjamin. In order to restore broken Benjamin, another and in any view far less guilty city is now to be crushed. The reconciliation of breaches made by wrath is to be made by means of wrath. The people lament that they have sworn an untimely oath, and instead of penitently seeking to be absolved from it before God, undertake to make it good by executing another, equally hard and severe, and that after "Jehovah" has smitten the rebellious (ch. xx. 35), and peace has been restored. Jabesh-Gilead was a valiant city, full of men of courage, as all Gileadites were. According to Eusebius, it lay six miles from Pella. Robinson searched for its site along the Wady which still bears the name Yâbis, and thought it probably that now occupied by some ruins, and called ed-Deir (Bibl. Res. iii. 319). The city must have been one of importance in Gilead. This is indicated by the fact that the Ammonite king Nahash selects it as his point of attack (1 Sam. xi.). In the history of Jephthah its name does not occur. When king Saul hears of the danger threatened the city by Nahash, he cuts a yoke of oxen into pieces, which he sends throughout all Israel with a summons to march to the relief of Jabesh-Gilead, and obtains a splendid victory. These historical notices suggest some noteworthy connections. Against Jabesh the Israelites now undertake the execution of a severe vow, in order to assist Benjamin. At a later date, Saul of Benjamin collects Israel around him, in order to deliver Jabesh. Jabesh does not come when summoned against Benjamin, by the pieces of the slain woman. Under Saul, Benjamin summons the whole people for Jabesh, by the pieces of a sacrificial animal.

Israel sends 12,000 valiant warriors against Jabesh-Gilead—a duly proportioned number, if 40,000 proceeded against Benjamin. The commander of these troops is instructed to destroy everything in Jabesh, except the virgin women, who are to be brought away, in order to be given to Benjamin. It may be assumed, however, that these instructions are to be so taken as that the army was to compel Jabesh to deliver up its virgin daughters as an expiation for its guilt, under threat of being proceeded with, in case of refusal, according to its proper deserts.<sup>1</sup> For it is not stated that the destruction was carried out; and, on the other hand, under Saul, Jabesh is again, to all appearances, the chief city of Gilead. The four hundred virgins are then, so to speak, the expiatory sacrifice for the guilty in Gilead. As such, and because the Gileadites were forced to surrender them, they could be given to Benjamin, notwithstanding the oath, which contemplated a voluntary giving. The words in ver. 14, "which they had saved alive of the women of Jabesh-Gilead," do not imply that the others were actually killed, but indicate that these were those who in any event were to be permitted to live for the sake of Benjamin, and who by their life—not as frequently among the heathen, by their death—helped to preserve the existence both of the Gileadites, from whom they were taken, and of the Benjamites, to whom they were given.<sup>2</sup> Inasmuch as they were preserved alive when it was possible to kill them, they were no longer considered to be such as ought not to be given to Benjamin. How instructive is all this! Israel will not break its oath, but evades it after all! If Gilead had deserved death, then its virgin women could not be allowed to live. If these may be saved alive, why should the children die? The Gileadites may not give their daughters voluntarily, but do not the Israelites give them for them? The surrender of these maidens is indeed a violent solution of the dilemma in which Israel finds itself, but the solution is only formal, not natural. The Greeks also, in cases of oaths thoughtlessly made, whose performance was maliciously insisted on, had recourse to formal exegesis, which avoided the real execution (cf. Herod. iv. 154; Nägelsbach, Nachkom. Theol., p. 244). For the sake of kindness to Benjamin, Israel here thought itself justified in adopting a similar course; for in order not to weaken the sanctity of oaths, they evaded that which they had sworn by a formal compliance. They soon found occasion to repeat the process; for the four hundred Gileaditish maidens were not sufficient.

CHAPTER XXI. 15-25.

15 And the people repented them for Benjamin, because that the Lord [Jehovah]
 16 had made a breach in the tribes of Israel. Then [And] the elders of the congregation said, How shall we do for wives for them that remain, seeing the women are 17 destroyed out of Benjamin? And they said, There must be an inheritance for them
 18 that be escaped of Benjamin,<sup>1</sup> that a tribe be not destroyed out of Israel. Howbeit, we may not give them wives of our daughters: for the children [sons] of 19 Israel have sworn, saying, Cursed be he that giveth a wife to Benjamin. Then they said, Behold, there is a feast of the Lord [Jehovah] in Shiloh yearly [.] in a place
 [omit: in a place] which [namely, Shiloh] is on the north side of Beth-el, on the east side of the highway that goeth up from Beth-el to Shechem, and on the south of 20 Lebonah. Therefore, they commanded the children [sons] of Benjamin, saying, Go,

- 21 and lie in wait in the vineyards; And see, and behold, if [when] the daughters of Shiloh come out to dance in dances, then come ye out of the vineyards, and catch you every man his wife of the daughters of Shiloh, and go to the land of Benjamin.
- 22 And it shall be, when their fathers or their brethren come unto us to complain [contend], that we will say unto them, Be favourable unto them for our sakes [Give us them kindly]: because we reserved [took] not to [omit: to] each man his wife in the war;<sup>2</sup> for ye did not give unto them at this time,<sup>3</sup> that ye should be
- 23 guilty. And the children [sons] of Benjamin did so, and took them wives, according to their number, of them that danced, whom they caught: and they went and
- 24 returned unto their inheritance, and repaired the cities, and dwelt in them. And the children [sons] of Israel departed thence at that time, every man to his tribe and to his family, and they went out from thence every man to his inheritance.
- 25 In those days there was no king in Israel: every man did that which was right in his own eyes.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 17. — יִרְשֶׁת פְּלִיטָה לְבִימָן. Dr. Cassel renders: "A portion of escape yet remains for Benjamin," i. e., a means of delivering the tribe from extinction. This agrees well with the context, but is expressed somewhat singularly. Kell: "'Possession of the saved shall be for Benjamin,' i. e., the territory of the tribe of Benjamin shall continue to be a separate possession for those Benjamites who have escaped the general slaughter." But this is not only incongruous with the context, but puts a meaning into the words which, as they stand, they cannot have. It seems to me that the better interpretation is as follows: In ver. 15, the people lament that a tribe is broken off. Thereupon the elders meet for consultation. It is agreed that the only thing needed to avert the catastrophe, lamented by the people as if it had already taken place, is a supply of wives. "There is a possession of escaped to Benjamin," say the elders (ver. 17), "and a tribe will not be destroyed out of Israel" (as the people lament). "We, it is true, cannot give them our daughters (ver. 18), but behold there is a feast in Shiloh" (ver. 19). — Ta.]

[2 Ver. 22. — נָפְצָה הַמִּלְחָמָה. Our author translates: als Kriegsbeute, i. e., as captives of war. cf. the exegetical remarks below. It seems better to refer the word to "the war" against Jabesh-Gilead. — Ta.]

[3 Ver. 22. — בְּעֵת הַהִיא. The word בְּעֵת, rendered "at this time" by the E. V., belongs to the last clause of the verse. The two clauses together are well rendered by Dr. Cassel: "for you have not given them to them, in which case (בְּעֵת) you would be guilty." He adds in a foot-note: "בְּעֵת" as in ch. xiii. 23; 'in which case he would not have caused us to hear things like these.' Bertheau refers also to Num. xxiii. 23. — Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Ver. 15 ff. The fact that the number of maidens obtained at Jabesh-Gilead proved insufficient, furnishes the occasion of another consultation, instituted by the "elders of the congregation" (ver. 16), in order not to let the tribe of Benjamin die out. Finally, they hit on one last piece of deliverance (יִרְשֶׁת פְּלִיטָה) that is yet left them: they conclude to point out to the Benjamites a method by which they may seize for themselves those wives, which Israel, by reason of its oath, cannot give them. The inhabitants of Jabesh, likewise, did not give their daughters; they were forcibly taken from them, and turned over as booty to the sons of Benjamin.

Shiloh was the scene of a periodically recurring feast, at which the maidens assembled from all regions, and executed dances in certain fixed places. For the sake of these places, and to enable the Benjamites to reach the proper locality without exciting particular attention, an exact description of the situation of Shiloh<sup>1</sup> is added.<sup>2</sup> For that it is not gone into for the sake of Shiloh itself, is evident from the fact that such descriptions are not elsewhere customary. The Benjamites are told of the vine-hills that enclose the dancing-places. There they are to wait, concealed in the thickets, until the maidens come forth; when they are to rush upon them, seize each a wife, and return with them, along the well-known roads, southward over Rimmon, to their territory, now again peaceably held by them. The Benjamites appear to have directed attention to the consequences of such an exploit, and the ill-will of fathers and brothers likely to be engendered by it. But the elders of the congregation quiet their apprehensions, and say:—

Ver. 22 ff. When their fathers or their brethren come unto us to contend. Verse 22 also has experienced the most singular expositions. The Syriac and Arabic versions have substituted לְהִוָּחֵל for לְהִוָּחֵל, wherein Studer proposes to follow them. Others, as Bertheau, deem it necessary to leave out the words בְּמִלְחָמָה . . . בִּי לָהֶם. Keil thinks that the words express the sense of the Benjamites, as if they had uttered them. And yet the matter is clear. The Benjamites, having recent experience of the consequences of lawlessness, are apprehensive of new troubles, in consequence of the proposed seizure. The elders quiet their fears, and say: No doubt, the fathers or brothers will come and contend warmly; and with us, for it will be manifest that we have given the occasion. Without this, you, the tribe of Benjamin, would not now have dared to do this thing. They will reproach us with having brought them under the curse of having violated their oath, inasmuch as you have obtained their daughters. Then shall we say to them (the fathers): Be quiet and gentle; give the maidens kindly to us. You know that we did not take them in war, as booty, as for instance, at Jabesh. We have indeed allowed them to be taken (for which no grudge is to be held against Benjamin); but in peace, not for injury: and as you did not give them, no guilt attaches to you. What else could we do to provide wives for Benjamin, without involving ourselves in the curse of a broken oath? We therefore allowed your daughters to be seized, but not as captives of war. Your daughters have gone to them involuntarily; and no curse can come on you, since you did not give them to them. The emphasis of the sentence lies on this very word לֹא־חָטְאוּ. Since we permitted them to be taken, there can be no thought of disgrace and war, or of insult. Therefore, do not contend; for why should there be contention where there is no war. The "elders" will ask forgiveness for themselves, on the ground that they meant it well with the seizure (לֹא־בְמַלְחָמָה), not in war; and fathers and brothers, whose wrath against Benjamin has now subsided, will all be satisfied, as soon as they are convinced that what has been done does not render them liable to the curse which lights on oath-breakers. For the oath that had been taken was latterly the chief hindrance in the way of reconciliation with Benjamin.

The Benjamites, thus encouraged, and made to feel secure against bad consequences, actually execute the proposed exploit, and with the wives thus won return happy to their renovated inheritance. Roman history, it is well known, has a celebrated occurrence of a similar nature in the rape of the Sabine women. A few analogous features are undoubtedly observable therein. The tribes of Italy refuse to enter into marriage treaties with the Romans; and the latter feared the destruction of their scarcely founded state. The Sabine rape occurred in the fourth month of Rome (Plutarch, Romulus, 14); and four months Benjamin had been sitting in the rock Rimmon. Benjamin received only maidens (vers. 12, 21); and only maidens likewise did the Romans seize (Plut. l. c.; Schwegler, Röm. Gesch. i. 478). It was also a feast for which the Sabine women appeared in Rome, albeit not as active participants. In Israel, it has been thoughtfully conjectured, the dancing maidens perhaps celebrated the memory of Miriam's festive chorus of timbrel-striking maidens, when Israel had safely passed through the Red Sea. The Romans celebrated the consualia on the anniversary of the rape of the Sabine maidens, and conceived the observance sacred to the sea-god. In like manner, the animal that symbolized Mars, the god whom Romulus chiefly served at Rome, was the wolf, whom also his worshippers did not disgrace. Benjamin is compared with a wolf, and the word יִלְדָּם, used of the seizure of the virgins (ver. 21), is afterwards applied as characterizing the wolf.<sup>1</sup>

Schwegler (Röm. Gesch. i. 469) declares that the rape of the Sabines is a myth, sprung from the conception of marriage as a robbery.<sup>2</sup> But it is precisely in this story that the seizure of women is contrasted, as a thing improper in itself, with the regular marriages of the other tribes. The idea of the narrative is rather to show the impossibility of maintaining laws prohibiting intermarriage between different tribes. It contained the lesson that the marriage connections of men overleap the historical divisions of tribes and families, and that just as the ship converts the separating sea into an highway of fellowship (Neptunus Equestris, for the sea is a steed), so connubium, the practice of intermarriage, is the commingling of different tribes. Consualia are, therefore, conjugalia; Consus is Conjux; the veiling and concealment connected with his festivals, corresponds to the concealment of the married (nubere, connubium), and the sacrifice of a mule corresponded to the wish, that although the union was one of heterogeneous elements, analogous to that from which the animal sprang, it might nevertheless not be marked by the barrenness of which he was a symbol.

But all this is yet more clearly taught by Benjamin's seizure of the maidens of Shiloh. Israel is the type of an organic nationality with different tribes. Should it attempt to abolish the practice of intermarriage, the result must be, either the forcible taking of women, or the death of a member of the living whole. In peace the Benjamites regain what they had lost in war. An ambuscade almost annihilated them: by an ambuscade they now win new life. Then Israel lay breathing forth wrath, in desolate wadys, in order to inflict barrenness: now, Benjamin lies among fertile vine-hills, in order to procure a blessing. It is frightful to think of Benjamin dissolving in flames, and his women and maidens falling by the inexorable sword; so that it must be acknowledged a grateful change when we can picture to ourselves the Benjamites hurrying away with their kidnapped prizes. But the seeming act of war was yet not without its terrors and tears, as suddenly the timbrels ceased to sound, and daughters screamed, and mothers wept. It was an image of war sufficient of itself to mark the horribleness of civil war. The narrative is given for the purpose of pointing out into what irregularities a people naturally falls when it lacks the organic unity of one general regimen. It closes with the words, which might form the superscription of the entire Book: "There was no king in Israel, and every man could do what seemed right in his own eyes."

CONCLUDING NOTE.—The time in which the occurrence at Gibeah and the events that grew out of it took place, it is not difficult to ascertain. Everything points back to the time in which the memories and traditions of Israel's military fellowship under Joshua were yet living and fresh. It is the period concerning which it is said, Josh. xxiv. 31, and Judg. ii. 7: "And the people served Jehovah all the days of Joshua, and all the days of the elders that outlived Joshua, who had seen all the great works of Jehovah, which he did for Israel."

It is also evident from the narrative that God was still zealously served. Counsel was sought from mother must be robbed of her child because she loves it. The narrative in question exhibits the necessity of robbery, because the stranger does not meet with love.

the Urim and Thummim. The people wept and fasted before God. They brought burnt-sacrifices and peace-offerings. Of idolatry, there is not a trace. Union with heathen women is held inconceivable. All Israel still feels itself under a military organization such as obtained under Moses and Joshua. In all probability, no great length of time had elapsed since military operations for the conquest of the land had come to a stand-still. From Judg. i. 22-26, it may be seen what great importance was attached to the conquest of Bethel. When the house of Joseph, in whose territory Shiloh and the estate of the high-priest lay (Josh. xxiv. 33), went up against Bethel, "Jehovah was with them." It is probable that from that time until into the days of the events that have just been related, the ark of the covenant was at Bethel, and that that place was the centre of military actions. The ark must, however, have been removed before the end of the Benjamite war; for when peace is restored, it is found in Shiloh. Its stay at Bethel cannot have been long, for there is there no permanent altar (ch. xxi. 4). The maidens of Jabesh, also, are not brought to Bethel, but to Shiloh (ch. xxi. 12). The exodus from Egypt is still in living remembrance (ch. xix. 30). Just as after the death of Joshua, the order was, "Judah first" (ch. i. 1), so it is now (ch. xx. 18). Nothing is visible as yet of the partial efforts of single tribes. All this is most clearly deducible from the fact that Phinehas, the son of Eleazar, and the grandson of Aaron, stands at the head of the sanctuary (ch. xx. 28). He was yet one of those who had seen the great works of Jehovah. Eleazar, his father, had died after Joshua. Until he himself died, Israel's religious condition was doubtless such as is described in ch. ii. 7. Moreover, his name and character suggest the inference that the events just treated of, are immediately connected with the preceding great age. It was Phinehas whose moral zeal incited him to slay the sinning Israelite in the territory of Moab, for which act he was praised as having "turned away the wrath of God" (Num. xxv. 7-12). To him, therefore, the moral indignation of Israel over the criminal outrage of Benjamin, is doubtless to be especially attributed. He had been selected by Moses to accompany a hostile expedition against Midian by which Israel had been seduced into heathen practices (Num. xxxi. 6). This expedition numbered twelve thousand men, — one thousand from each tribe. The expedition against Jabesh-Gilead was organized in a similar manner. If this type of priestly zeal for faith and purity of morals stood at the head of Israel, the whole war against Benjamin, at least so far as its motives are concerned, becomes plain. Before this, a similar war against the two and a half transjordanic tribes had almost occurred. These tribes, as we are told in Josh. xxii., had built themselves an altar: the sons of Israel this side the Jordan thought that it was intended for idolatrous purposes. They came together in Shiloh, and resolved to proceed against the supposed apostates. But first an embassy was sent, at whose head Phinehas again stood (ver. 13). The address which he made to them is altogether in the spirit of the action determined on against Benjamin.

But it is precisely this last named occurrence that enables us to characterize yet more narrowly the catastrophe related in chaps. xx. and xxi., and to comprehend the design with which it stands, not at the beginning, but at the close of the Book, and alongside of the history of Micah. It is not stated that a solemn embassy, like that in Josh. xxi. 19 ff., was sent to Benjamin, to set his sin before him in the spirit of kindness. Everything is indeed done according to the forms of the law and under priestly instruction, but with such assured consciousness of power, and with such carnal fanaticism, that the zeal is not pleasing, and is finally attended by lamentable consequences. The moral motive of the war against Benjamin is certainly to be praised; but the blind rage in victory is of the flesh. The crime of Benjamin was horrible; but the unity, determination, and perseverance which Israel manifests against this tribe, end in a fanaticism which at last forgot that the war was waged only because Benjamin was a brother, and that he was treated worse than national enemies had ever been. This is the lesson which the narrator designs to teach by placing this narrative at the close of his Book. He censures what his narrative contained, for both at its beginning and at its close he says: "there was no king in those days."

In the next place, he furnishes an opportunity to compare the tribes of Dan and Benjamin with each other, in their characters, their deeds, and their fortunes. Both were preëminently warlike. But this valor, to what did they turn it? Why was not Dan as bold against the Philistines as against peaceful Laish? or why did not Benjamin turn his martial spirit against Jebus, a place of such importance to him? Dan founds an idolatrous worship in order not to lose his tribe-consciousness; and Benjamin defends a crime by way of resenting the interference of other tribes. Dan's offense, however, is justly deemed more heinous than that of Benjamin; for it committed a spiritual sin against the Spirit of the eternal God, while Benjamin protected a terrible, indeed, but yet only fleshy crime. The difference shows itself also in the consequences. It is true that both Benjamin and Dan lose their proper importance. The cities and territories of both are taken by Judah. But the hero who comes out of Dan, Samson, is none of theirs who practice idolatry in the north. His fame did not redound to their honor. But out of Benjamin arose, after this, more than one glorious deliverer. When he was yet but a remnant, Ehud rose up in the midst of him to be a deliverer. Saul and Jonathan — the first king and his royal son — were Benjamites.

This being so, the narrator allows the reproach to fall on Israel of having acted so differently with respect to Dan and Benjamin. In the face of deeds like those of Micah and Dan, it remained inactive, neither warned nor took any other measure, although the sins were mortal in their nature; whereas it nearly destroyed Benjamin. And even before these occurrences in Benjamin, where was this united strength, when, in disregard of the law, heathen people, as the prophet tells them in ch. ii., were left to pursue their own modes of life and idol service?

It was this that drew the punishment after it. Had the external unity been in possession of its earlier internal strength, not only would the victory over Benjamin have been gained more quickly, but the servitude under foreign foes would not have come so soon. The observance of external forms, the customary prayer, the usual routine of worship in war and peace, are of no avail, unless animated by living faith.

Israel felt that one tribe was lacking to protect its eastern flank on the Jordan, when Moab invaded the country. True, it was a Benjamite, Ehud, who delivered the country from the tyrant, but it was only by the help of Ephraim (ch. iii. 27) that he gained the complete victory. His own tribe were too few in numbers. Even Saul was still conscious that he came from the smallest tribe of Israel (1 Sam. ix. 21), although under him Israel already felt that "there was a king in the land."

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

The Book closes with two highly significant narratives. In connection with what has gone before, they demonstrate the insufficiency of the existing national organization. Even under the great heroes, national unity, in the full sense of the word, did no longer exist. Deborah complains of the indifference of the tribes to the common weal. Gideon experiences the envy of Ephraim, which under Jephthah breaks out into bloody hostility. Samson stood alone, whom his own people themselves propose to hand over to the enemy. The Judgeship affords no guaranty of national unity. With this, there is wanting also concentrated discipline against sin. Sin, therefore, can do what it will. There is a lack of authority. Hence, the Book of Judges forms the introduction to the Books of the Kings. Both concluding narratives show what the consequences are when the law loses its force, when faith grows weak, when apostasy breaks loose, and subjective arbitrariness asserts itself. The first sketches more particularly the decay of nationality, as exhibited in the arbitrariness of the individual; the second, the discords that result from the passionate procedures of the whole nation. The arbitrariness revealed by the first, concerns spiritual matters; that by the second, is fleshly in its nature. The first shows that against the service of God anything may be done with impunity: the second, that for fleshly sins blood is made to flow in streams. In both cases, indeed, sin punishes itself; but it broke forth, because every one did what he would. Moral decay always shows itself first in the priestly order. In both narratives, the frivolity of a Levite is a principal cause of the lamentable results that ensue. This opens the way to subjective arbitrariness of every kind, which superstition uses to its own advantage. Micah builds a private sanctuary, and under priestly forms sets up idolatry. He was punished for his sin, by being made to experience the thing he had done. He committed a robbery on the spirit of Israelitish law, and he was robbed, by Dan, of all he had applied to this purpose. As he had done, so it was done to him. The arbitrariness which he had exercised, was pleasing to others also. The priest who had sold himself to him, departed when he found a better buyer. The insubordination allowed the individual, because there was no one vested with general authority, permitted also a tribe to leave its appointed territory. One tribe (Dan), strong enough to rob the weaker, but with not enough spirit to win the land assigned it from the Philistines, removes into a distant region, and destroys a peaceable city. Robbery and murder are followed by permanent idolatry under the priestly charge of a descendant of Moses.

From all this we may see what the consequences

1 [The following "Homiletical and Practical" paragraphs are based on the whole of "Part Third" of the Book, from chap. xvii. to xxi. inclusive. As will be seen, it was im-

would be were Christianity to become wholly inactive in the state. Persons, who deem themselves virtuous, suppose that the religion of a living God is by no means absolutely necessary for social life. But as soon as religion falls into decay, and before its influence ceases altogether, the moral supports of society fall to pieces. When the ministers of the Word begin to regard good positions more than truth, ruin is at hand. Venality is followed by its evil consequences, although he who is ready to sell himself know enough of the language of the day to conceal it. A Christian must serve no idols. The more surely, therefore, is it a sign of decay, when he makes a business of serving superstition.

STARKE: The creature is to be applied for God's honor, but not in honoring him. Arbitrariness in parts, leads to arbitrariness in the whole. If the foundation-stone, piety, be removed, then the tribes, like stones of a building, fall apart. The fear of God is the beginning of all wisdom, and also the protector of all peace.

ON CHAPS. XIX.-XXI. — When the command of God is no longer in the heart, priests become carnal, and their flocks lawless. As the Levite runs after a concubine, so the people of Gibeah seek the indulgence of bestial lusts. Who will imitate the morals of a master, who rejects God's sacred command. If in Gibeah the law of Jehovah is dishonored with impunity, how can it be expected that they will show obedience toward their brethren? Israel is indignant at the sins of Benjamin, but does it turn away from its own? Virtuous indignation is not difficult, but careful self-examination is more necessary. The rod may undertake to maintain supremacy, but only truth can succeed in doing it. Civil war arises not from political, but from moral dangers. The love of peace will begin as soon as self-righteousness ceases. Seb. Schmidt observes: "The best way of conciliating an enemy is to do him good." But kind deeds towards an enemy spring only from love, which is a daughter of repentance. The severest judges of morals often know least of this love. Love is most needed when it becomes necessary to punish. Israel began to grieve bitterly when Benjamin was almost destroyed. Men recognize only when too late, what the root was in the beginning. Lewdness strangles compassion. Carnal zeal consumes consideration. Self-righteousness irritates the minds of men. Only at the altar of God, through the pious priest, does peace come into being.

GERLACH: In all this it becomes manifest what Israel might have been and continued to be, if it had clung faithfully to the Lord and his commandments, and had preserved its covenant with the Lord, and by that very means its national purity, unimpaired. — THE SAME: The people, drawing near to God in the presentation of expiatory burnt-offerings, sought in these offerings to remove the breach between the holiness of the Lord and their own sinfulness; and in the sacred meals that followed the offering, to obtain the assurance of the assistance of divine grace as they went forth into the holy war.

Only where the gospel is heard and followed, is there peace. For that reason, the Lord, our Saviour, says to all his disciples: Peace be with you!

practicable to place them under the several parts of the text to which they refer, according to the plan pursued in the other parts of the volume (cf. the note on p. 19). — TR.]

THE BOOK OF RUTH.

INTRODUCTION.

§ 1. Contents and Aim.

THE little Book of Ruth, the exposition of which usually follows that of the Book of Judges, consists of only eighty-five verses; but these inclose a garden of roses, as fragrant and full of mystic calyxes, as those which the modern traveller still finds blooming and twining about the solitary ruins of Israel and Moab, this side the Jordan and beyond. The significance and beauty of the brief narrative cannot be highly enough estimated, whether regard be had to the thought which fills it, the historical value which marks it, or the pure and charming form in which it is set forth. It will be necessary rightly to seize its fundamental idea, in order to treat to advantage the other historical questions which present themselves with reference to the time of its composition and place in the canon of the Old Covenant.

An ancient Israelitish family of Bethlehem fell into misery. They had left their native country in a time of distress, in order to save themselves from participating in it. But in the stranger's land, in Moab, a harder fate alights upon them. Death carries off father and sons; the mother remains behind, childless and widowed. True, she has daughters-in-law; but these are without offspring, and — Moabitesses, aliens, not without fault chosen to be wives of her sons. Naomi's situation is as bad as it can be. In Moab she cannot remain; sorrowfully she returns to Bethlehem. Her house is desolated; upon herself, rests the hand of God. But in the midst of despair, a consolation arises for her. Ruth, her Moabitish daughter-in-law, remains with her, — no dissuasion of her mother-in-law restrains her. She gives up everything, native land and paternal home, yea, even the hope of better fortunes, continues faithful to her love for Naomi, and goes with her to her God and her people, — but in tears, poverty, and bereavement.

Naomi arrives at Bethlehem, but no one helps, no one comforts her. Ruth alone becomes her support, — she labors, she begs for her. Her piety, however, does not remain unknown. The kindnesses done to these women by Boaz, on whose fields Ruth had been gleaning, originated solely in the man's admiration of the pious love of Ruth, although it is true that he was a kinsman of Naomi. Ruth the noble man blesses, because she has taken refuge under the wings of God in Israel. She reinstates her mother-in-law in the good-will of her relatives. She overcomes the prejudices of Israel against the stranger. The rights of an Israelitish wife fall to her lot. But it is only on account of her love and purity that the blessing of Boaz fulfills itself. For her mother's sake she enters once more on a hard and difficult road. But thereby the sorrow of Naomi is at last lifted away. Boaz fulfills to Ruth the law of Israel, and marries her. From the Moabitess springs the son, of whom David, the king of Israel, who rose from among the flocks of Bethlehem to be a hero and a prophet, is the celebrated grandson.

With good reason the book is not called "Naomi," or "Boaz," or "the Descent of David," but "Ruth." For she is the central point of the whole narrative. Her love is the groundwork of the history it relates. That she became the ancestress of David was only the reward of her virtue. The idea to be set forth, and which gives such great significance to the little book, is, the power of love, as conquering all national contrarieties, hostilities, and prejudices.

It is not a story of romantic love between man and woman, but of the reverential love of a widow for the mother of her deceased husband. The love portrayed in the character of Ruth is of the purest, most unselfish, most extraordinary kind. It is for the sake of this love, to indicate its nature, that the strength which leaves father and mother, and accepts the God of Israel, is delineated. For Naomi can be thus loved of Ruth only because the latter has some intuitive perception of the higher life of the God of Israel in her mother-in-law.

The Jewish narrative, therefore, does not only, with unselfish uprightness, set forth the overpowering depth of affection of a Moabitess; it teaches also that such love is valid before God, without respect of race, that through it Ruth is more deeply implanted into the kingdom of the true Israel than are natural children — consequently the women say to Naomi, that Ruth is better for her than seven sons — and that the blessing of God was poured out in superabundant measure on Ruth, although a foreigner, because she had confessed the God of Israel in love and from love.

The narrative displays no hatred toward foreigners, gives no prominence to the keen discriminations of the Mosaic law against them notwithstanding that they form the background of the story; does not blame the really well-disposed Orpah, although she turns back; has not a word of reprehension for the anonymous relative who refuses to marry Ruth; but in contrast to these facts, it causes the brightness of the blessing that lights on Ruth to become known. Orpah is forgotten, the name of the superstitious kinsman unknown, but Ruth — is the grandmother of David.

The Book was not written for the glorification of the king; for how, according to human views, could he be flattered by such a descent! But the fact of David's descent from Ruth, demonstrates and glorifies the praise of such an act as she did. It is a book of praise of true love and virtue; a book of reconciliation for those alien nations who betake themselves under the wings of the living God. In Boaz and Ruth, Israel and the Gentiles are, as it were, personified. In order to come under the wings of Israel, nothing is needed but the love and faith of Ruth. From these, and not from legal descent according to the flesh, do the might and glory of the kingdom of God proceed. The Book, it is often said, with its contents, stands at the portal of the history of David; according to its spirit, it stands, like the Psalms, at the gates of the Gospel. And this not only on account of the genealogy of Christ in the latter, which carries us back to David and Boaz, but because of the spirit which informs the doctrine of our Book, that the greatest king of Israel sprang from the reconciliation of Israel and the Gentiles, from the marriage of Boaz and Ruth in the confession of Jehovah.

§ 2. Time of Composition.

It is precisely the free and loving spirit with which Ruth is depicted, the Moabitess set forth as the ancestress of David for the instruction and joy of the reader, that enables us, on somewhat closer inspection, to determine, with considerable definiteness, the time in which alone the book can have been written.<sup>1</sup> It is to be observed that the Books of Samuel say nothing of the descent of David from Ruth. Without the little book now under consideration, this fact would be entirely unknown to us. For the Book of Chronicles also, although it names Boaz as the ancestor of David in such a way that it were easy to believe that use was made of the last verses of Ruth, passes over the name of Ruth in utter silence.

That our Book cannot have been written after Solomon, is evident from 1 Kgs. xi. 1, where the king is blamed for having taken many foreign wives of Moab, Ammon, Edom, Zidon, and Heth, "nations concerning which Jehovah said to the sons of Israel, Ye shall not go in to them, neither shall they come in unto you." It is not for the honor of Rehoboam that the historian relates that his mother was Naamah, an Ammonitess (1 Kgs. xiv. 21). Nor is it without design that the (second) Book of Chronicles, ch. xxiv. 26 (the passage is wanting in Kings) informs us that the mother of one of the murderers of King Joash was a Moabitess, of the other an Ammonitess. Ezra says (ch. x. 10): "Ye have transgressed, and have taken strange wives;" and the names of those who were to separate from their wives were noted down. Nehemiah (ch. xiii. 1 ff.) went so far as to execute strictly the law that "no Ammonite or Moabite should come into the congregation of God forever." These negative data are sufficient of themselves to refute the opinion that the book written in praise of a Moabitess who did enter into the congregation of God, was perhaps composed in the times after Solomon, or during the exile, or when the spirit of Ezra or Nehemiah was in the ascendant. It is especially clear that it cannot have been written in the Exile, for in that situation Israel maintained the sharpest separation between itself and the Gentiles<sup>1</sup> (cf. Esth.

<sup>1</sup> The Mishna (Jebamoth, II. 5) decided that a Levirate marriage cannot be demanded by a brother-in-law, if he be the son of a slave woman or of a foreigner.

iii. 8). The Book, moreover, exhibits a homelike, peaceful coloring inconsistent with that time of expatriation and distress. It cannot even be assigned to the reign of Solomon; for in that case the genealogy at the close would hardly have failed to add: "And David begat Solomon."

But there are not wanting positive grounds which make it highly probable that the Book originated in the time of David, and while he occupied the throne, — circumstances which add their own instruction to that of the Book. It must indeed be admitted that our information concerning the great revolution brought about in Israel by the achievements, spirit, and reign of David, is very meagre and fragmentary. But it is also true that too little attention has been paid to the fact that the new occupant of the throne at Jerusalem was not merely a hero, but a creative genius, whom singular sufferings and experiences had thoroughly tried, and in whom the full heart of Israel beat powerfully and grandly, although he appears not without the human coloring of his age. From the very opening of his public career in the combat with Goliath, and ever after, he displays, as no one else did, the enthusiastic strength of faith and the immovable religious convictions of a true Israelite; and yet it was he, driven into exile through Saul's distrust, who more than any other hero or prince, before or after, came into peculiar contact with alien nations. It was doubtless due, in part at least, to the recollection that his great-grandmother was a Moabitess, that he went to the king of Moab and said, "Let my father and my mother, I pray thee, come forth and be with you, till I know what God will do to me" (1 Sam. xxii. 3). Accordingly, he causes his father and mother to emigrate to the same country whither Elimelech and his family had gone. And they remained in Moab until David was master of Jerusalem. So also, at a later time, he remembers that the king of Ammon had formerly shown him kindness (2 Sam. x. 2). While he was hiding in the cave of Adullam, all sorts of wild and warlike people collected about him, of whom he formed his band of heroes and afterwards his body-guard. Their names Kerethi and Pelethi (2 Sam. viii. 18, etc.) sufficiently indicate their foreign origin. He abode a long time in the Philistine city of Gath (1 Sam. xxvii.); and there bands of brave men attached themselves so entirely to him, that they continued faithful to him even in his last great distress, brought upon him by Absalom (2 Sam. xv. 18). But everywhere he bore aloft the banner of his God and people. Whoever followed him, entered not merely into his personal interests, but also into those of Israel (cf. 1 Sam. xxvi. 10, etc.). Through the glory and heroism of his history, aided by the preparatory influence of Saul's achievements, the heathen, who till then continued to reside among Israel, were undoubtedly for the most part amalgamated with Israel, so that the intellectual preponderance of Israel, reinforced by military superiority, suppressed idolatry and extended the acknowledgment of Jehovah.

We are reminded here especially of Uriah, who fell a victim to David's unlawful passions. This man, a hero and distinguished personage in Israel, was a Hittite or descendant of Heth (2 Sam. xi. 3). From his widow, that is, from an Israelitish woman once married to a Hittite, sprang king Solomon, just as David descended from a Moabitish woman, the widow of an Israelite. Nor is Uriah the only foreigner among David's distinguished warriors; the list includes also an Ammonite named Zelek (2 Sam. xxiii. 37). It is remarkable, also, that David deposits the ark of God in the house of a Gittite, that is, a man who originated in Gath, a city of the Philistines. He was called Obed Edom, thus bearing the same name with David's grandfather, the son of Ruth.<sup>1</sup> His surname Edom also betrays his alien origin. The ark of God was three months in his dwelling, and God blessed him and his house.

Yet more noteworthy is the fact that in the saddest hours of David's life, when his favorite son, Absalom, and the chief men of Israel fell away from him, only such as had turned from among alien nations to Israel and its God remained true to him. He himself had the same experience which Naomi had with Ruth; they who loved him dared everything for him and with him. An Ammonite supplies him with provisions in his flight (2 Sam. xvii. 27). Especially prominent is Hushai the Archite,<sup>2</sup> the companion of David, who in the hour of distress adheres to him, and renders him most important service at the court of Absalom, in <sup>1</sup> In the Levirate marriage of Ruth the symbolism of the shoe was employed. Obed Edom was the son of such a marriage. It is precisely with reference to Edom that the figurative expression: "I cast my shoe upon it," twice occurs in the Psalms (ix. and cviii.). The Book of Chronicles first calls Obed Edom a Levite. Errors, however, such as those into which expositors fell concerning Kenas (cf. Com. on Judges, ch. i. 16), must here also be avoided.

thwarting the intrigues of the apostate Abithophel (2 Sam. xv. 32 ff.). Touching is the fidelity of Ittai, the man of Gath. The king says to him (2 Sam. xv. 19 ff.): "Wherefore goest thou also with us? return to thy place, and abide with the king, for thou art a stranger. If thou art banished, go to thy native place.<sup>1</sup> Whereas thou camest but yesterday, should I this day make thee go up and down with us? seeing I go whither I may; return thou, and take back thy brethren: mercy and truth be with thee!" David, the fleeing king, who in his old age must leave his capital, speaks like Naomi. The answer of Ittai shows that he, like Ruth, has turned to the God of Israel: "As Jehovah liveth, and as my lord the king liveth, surely in what place my lord the king shall be, whether in death or life, even there also will thy servant be." Never again, in the history of the ancient Israel, do such relations come to view. Under their influence, and therefore during the reign of David, the composition of a book which commemorates the truth and love of a Gentile, was perfectly natural. It is a signature of the spirit, more active in Israel than at any other time, which recognized faith in God as the kernel of the kingdom of God, and saw that not only natural, but also spiritual Israelites could become its children. It must not be overlooked that it is especially in the Psalms that the relations of the Gentiles to the kingdom of God are unfolded. Take as specimens of many similar passages, these two: "Thou makest me the head of the nations; a people that I knew not, serves me" (Ps. xviii. 43).<sup>2</sup> "All the families of the nations shall bow down before thee; for the kingdom is Jehovah's, and he rules among the nations" (Ps. xxii. 27, 28).<sup>3</sup>

To point out definitely the years of David's reign during which the Book was written, will hardly be possible. But it is not improbable that it was done when he stood on the summit of his glory and enjoyed peace on all sides. At that time, a contemplative view of the king's history, in which so many men of alien origin had distinguished themselves by wonderful fidelity, gave rise to our Book. It may be assumed that its narrative concerning David's excellent ancestress influenced the bearing of the king's faithful Gentile subjects, as manifested in the catastrophe of Absalom. It is a genuine historical characteristic of the reign of David, that it, and not the Psalter merely, is Messianic. It is informed by the idea of universality bounded only by the acknowledgment of Jehovah. It brought about closer connections between Israel and the Gentiles, which continued to exist in the reign of Solomon. The fall of this king, toward the close of his reign, consists in the very fact that he no longer subjected these connections to the domination of the God of Israel, but suffered his own faith and morals to be overcome by heathen influences. Solomon would not have been to blame for taking wives of Moab and Ammon, if these, like Ruth, had confessed Jehovah; his fall consisted in his taking heathen wives, who withdrew him from the pure service of God. The Messianic idea was distorted, consequently obliterated and for a long time lost, and only restored by the vision of the prophets.

Nothing of importance can be urged against assigning the origin of our Book to this period, almost the only time in which it can have been written. The arguments which Bertheau, after Ewald and other earlier critics, founds on linguistic peculiarities, are not at all conclusive, and are sufficiently met by Keil's counter-remarks (Einleit. § 137). The more unusual expressions are due to the peculiarities of the matter, and are also to be met with elsewhere. The narrative exhibits life in its popular aspect, and probably makes use of popular forms of speech which to us seem Chaldaizing. This very circumstance attests the antiquity of the Book. A book of similar character, written in the Exile, would no longer possess the manifold idioms peculiar to original forms and views of life. Considering the small number of literary productions that have come down to us from the several earlier centuries of Hebrew history, and our ignorance of the places of their composition and the dialect of their writers, it is manifest that any attempts to fix the time in which any work was written by means of a few grammatical peculiarities alone, must always be exceedingly problematical. In the present case, however, the contents of the Book itself contradict the conclusion to which such a method of argumentation has led. For these speak decidedly against an exile, and in favor of a Palestinian origin, in a peaceful, and indeed a definitely limited period. Critics have paid only too little continuous attention to these contents, and hence were led to overestimate sundry externalities of the Book.

1 [This is Dr. Cassel's own rendering of the difficult words אֶתָּה לְמִקְוֵיךָ. — Tr.]

2 This Psalm, at least, is admitted by Olshausen also to be Davidic. Psalmen, p. 98.

3 The history of this Psalm might alone testify to a higher antiquity than modern criticism will allow it. Delitzsch says (Die Psalmen, p. 194): "It is a Davidic Psalm, of the time during which its author was persecuted by Saul."

§ 3. Position in the Canon.

The position which Jewish tradition assigned to our Book in the Canon, may likewise be due to the spirit of its contents. The Septuagint, it is true, attached it closely to the Book of Judges, as if it were but an appendix of that work,<sup>1</sup> and was followed therein by Josephus and the Christian Fathers who were for the most part dependent on that version. Possibly, the desire to make the number of books equal to the number of letters in the alphabet may have contributed to this result; for even in later times the supposed coincidence was invested with symbolical significance. Ecclesiastes, Proverbs, and Canticles could not be so directly attached to another book, there being none specially devoted to the history of Solomon, while Ruth and Lamentations could readily be joined to other writings. But it cannot have been for liturgical purposes merely, that the Canon of the Palestinian Jews, as appears from the Talmud, corroborated by manuscripts and traditions, considers Ruth as well as Lamentations as a separate work, and never unites it with Judges. If the little work be viewed simply as a genealogical narrative introductory to the history of David, then, indeed, its proper place is between Judges' and the Books of Samuel. But since this is not its true character, since it sets forth a higher idea, of which the birth of David is but the crown and confirmation, an independent position was rightly assigned to it. The Messianic doctrine contained in it invested it with greater importance. Now, from the fact that the Jews continued the Book in this separate and independent position, although they saw that the followers of Christ viewed him as the descendant of Ruth, it may be inferred that in the Palestinian canon Ruth held, even before the birth of our Lord, the same position as at present. It harmonizes well with this, that from primitive times the Book was read during the Feast of Weeks. For this cannot have been done simply because a harvest scene occurs in it.<sup>2</sup> The practice must rather be connected with a belief that Ruth prefigures the entrance of the heathen into the kingdom of God, and with the idea that the Feast of Weeks was a celebration of the giving of the law on Sinai, which law, as the Midrash explains, was given to all nations, only it was not accepted by them. The Feast of Weeks, we know, corresponded to the Christian Pentecost, when the Holy Ghost was poured out, according to the words of Joel, on all flesh, and the Gospel was preached to all the world.

Undoubtedly, however, the Book of Ruth offers an interesting parallel to that of Judges. While the latter exhibits the military history of Israel, the former introduces us to the peaceful private life of the people. We hear no trumpet-blasts or peans of triumph, only the rustling of the sickles among the grain stalks salutes our ears. We find ourselves transported into the rural family life of Israel. Not the warrior or king, but the farmer and householder find their prototypes here.<sup>3</sup> The little book relates a narrative of social village life, and within its brief compass exhibits the profoundest sorrow, the noblest love, and all the attractiveness of an Israelitish life of faith. Naomi and Boaz are not painted in the same colors as Deborah and Gideon. But the love of Ruth and Orpah can only have grown up in the household of Naomi. Israel's fathers and husbands must have so lived as to enchain even after their death the hearts of foreign and childless widows. With what nobility and moral beauty the faithful in Israel were adorned, is seen in Boaz. The whole picture is surmounted by a calm, clear sky. The reader finds himself now in the open field, now on the road, and anon among the assembly of citizens at the gate. The unadorned narrative shows such art in grouping, preserves such moderation, causes the finest lessons to shine through so gently, and withal displays such great vivacity, that the æsthetics of the little work alone yield an important testimony to its origin. It can have arisen only under surroundings such as those it describes. It breathes an air of freedom and peace wholly inconsistent with the unrest

1 [Subjoined it without a separate title. The Jewish canon places it in the third class of O. T. books, the Kethubim or Hagiographa. Its place in this class is variable; the Talmud and some MSS. give it the first, but most MSS. the fifth place. Cf. Wright, Book of Ruth, introd. § xl. 4. — Tr.]

2 The reasons for this usage given by Raschi and others, are, in their final consequences, undoubtedly tantamount to the proclamation of the kingdom of God among the nations. Cf. Heldenheim, Maachor Schebnath, 1811, p. 106, note.

3 [WORDSWORTH (contrasting the Book of Ruth with that of Judges): The Book of Ruth is like some beautiful landscape of Claude, with its soft mellow hues of quiet eventide, and the peaceful expanse of its calm lake, placed side by side with some stern picture of Salvator Rosa, exhibiting the shock of armies and the storm of war; and receiving more beauty from the chiaro-oscuro of the contrast. Or, if we may adopt another comparison, derived from classical literature, the Book of Ruth, coming next after the Book of Judges [which he regards as its proper place], is like a transition from the dark, terrific scenes of a tragedy of Æschylus, to the fresh and beautiful landscapes of some pastoral Idyl of Theocritus, transporting us to the rural Thalyria, or harvest-home, under the shade of elms and poplars, on the banks of the Halls (Idyl vii. 1, 8), or to the flowery meadows and sheepwalks on those of the Arethusa or Anapus (Idyl i. 68, 117; vii. 151). — Tr.]

and servitude of the Exile. Indeed, one is tempted to believe that the author must have lived in Bethlehem itself. He loves to indicate, with untutored art, the peculiarities of speech which obtain among his dramatis personæ. He makes his rustics talk in rustic fashion,<sup>1</sup> while yet, when Boaz speaks on elevated subjects, the language rises to the level of the theme.

§ 4. Time of the History.

The time in which the occurrences themselves took place, can hardly be more closely determined. Boaz was the great-grandfather of David. For it is not to be supposed that between Boaz and Obed, or Obed and Jesse, other names have fallen out. A wider remove of Ruth from David contradicts the thought and doctrine of the Book. The view that Boaz may have been a contemporary of Gideon<sup>2</sup> is without anything to support it. The Book suggests not a hint of war; and although it speaks of famine in the land, there is not the least indication that it was a result of hostile devastations. Much rather does ch. i. 6 (cf. the Comment.) suggest elemental causes. The ancient opinion, found in Josephus, which places the occurrences of our Book in the time of Eli, has certainly much greater probability in its favor, since the later years of Boaz and the life of Obed may be conceived as running parallel with the life of Eli, and that of Samuel with Jesse. It is also remarked below that an attitude of mutual hostility between Israel and the Philistines, may explain why Elimelech emigrated to Moab.

Some expositors (Ewald, Bertheau) have found that the author of our Book maintains a specially "learned bearing," because in ch. iv. he gives information concerning certain old customs, and have inferred from it that he must have written at a late period. But he has only done, in the simplest manner, what it is the duty of every narrator to do, namely, explain and give information on points in need of it. He gives a picture of popular life; in which he no more excuses himself from drawing the pursuit of the humble gleaner than the transactions at the gate of the city. Perhaps nothing testifies more clearly for the antiquity of the Book than ch. iv. The Mosaic law speaks of the pulling off of the shoe only in the particular case in which a widow, being refused marriage by her deceased husband's brother, is authorized to subject the offender to this action as a sign of disgrace. But this was only a special application of a more general symbolical idea connected with the shoe, and explanatory of its earlier use in transactions of exchange and redemption generally.<sup>3</sup> Now, it was just because the Mosaic law prescribed the use of the shoe only in the case just mentioned, that it ceased to be used on other occasions. Consequently, it was precisely during the better observance of the law under Samuel, Saul, and David, that its use as the general symbol of transfer of rights or property had become obsolete. That which takes place at the gate of Bethlehem is no such transaction as is described in Deut. xxv. 7 ff. The unknown kinsman does not regard it as such. It has reference solely to the redemption of the landed property. Nor is Ruth present. Had the Book been written in the Exile, when the letter of the law had become impressed upon the people, an explanation of this absence would not have been wanting, just as Josephus conceives it necessary to add, quite in opposition to the narrative, that Ruth having been sent for by Boaz, the whole levirate process was performed according to legal prescription. In our author's time the recollection of the usages he describes, was

<sup>2</sup> [Among later writers who favor this opinion, Hengstenberg may be mentioned, who urges that if the famine had resulted from bad harvests, it must also have extended to the neighboring land of Moab, and points out how well the ten years' sojourn in Moab agrees with the seven years' oppression by the Midianites, for "some years must necessarily have elapsed till the land could recover from its effects, and again present that flourishing state of cultivation in which Naomi found it on her return" (Dissert. on Pent., ii. 92, note, Ryland's translation). Bertheau (Com. p. 234) replies that the time of Gideon is inconsistent with the genealogy of ch. iv. 21, 22, which affords the only certain data for determining the question. He places the history in the latter part of the time of the Judges, or somewhere in the earlier part of the Philistine domination over Israel. Kell in his Einleitung, § 187, note 1 (2d edit., 1859) agrees with Bertheau, and fixes on the time shortly before Eli; but in his commentary (publ. 1863) adopts the view of Hengstenberg, and although he thinks it not impossible that the genealogy is incomplete, so that Obed may have been the grandfather of Jesse, yet endeavors to show that even on the supposition that it is complete, Obed may have been born in the last years of Gideon. But he appears to forget that the combination of the famine with the Midianite devastations requires Obed to be born, not in the last, but in the earlier years of Gideon; for the impression left by the narrative is that the union of Ruth with Boaz took place not very long after the return from Moab (cf. ch. i. 22 b). Now, supposing that the emigration occurred in the fifth year of the Midianite oppression, the return, ten years afterwards, would fall in the 8th year of Gideon. But from say the 10th year of Gideon to the birth of David is according to Kell's own reckoning, a period of 127 years, somewhat too long to be spanned by means of one intervening birth. According to Dr. Cassel's chronology (cf. Introd. to Judges, § 4) the interval would be thirty years longer. — Tr.]

fresher; the usages themselves having disappeared but a few generations before. Nor is this notice of obsolete customs peculiar to the Book of Ruth. Other O. T. books make similar explanations. Thus, the author of the Books of Samuel observes that "formerly" prophets were called "seers" (1 Sam. ix. 9); and the author of the Book of Judges frequently gives the earlier names of cities of which he has occasion to speak.

§ 5. Translations and Commentaries.

The translation of our Book in the Septuagint bears a verbal character. The relation of Josephus (Ant. v. 9) evinces his efforts to bring the statements of the Biblical accounts into harmony with the prescription of the law as observed in his time, and not to allow the virtues of Israel to be too much eclipsed by those of foreigners. The Chaldee translation, the Targum, being intended for the public instruction of the people, follows the same course yet more decidedly. It carries back into the ancient times of Ruth a good deal of later apprehension and exposition. Its interpolations may be found collected, for the most part, in the Midrash Ruth Rabba,<sup>1</sup> which, on its part, has chiefly drawn from the Gemara of Jerusalem and older Midrashim. The Babylonian Talmud gives expositions of detached passages of Ruth: Berachoth, 7; Sabbat, 113; Jebamoth, 47; Nasir, 23; Babakama, 30; Bababathra, 91; Sanhedrin, 19. There is another collection of Rabbinical interpretations in Jalkut Simeoni, tom. ii. ed. Venez. n. 596 ff.

Interesting philological explanations on the Chaldee version of the Targum are given in the rare book: Perush hamiloth, Krakau, 1540-44. The most important commentaries of mediæval Jewish scholars, are those of Raschi and Ibn Esra. The commentary of Solomon ben Melech was published by Joh. Ben. Carpsov, in the Collegium Rabbunico Biblicum in librum Ruth, Lips. 1703, and republished by Reland.

The earlier Christian theology accorded little special treatment to the Book of Ruth. Casiodorus (De Divinis Lectionibus, cap. 1) says: "Ancient expositions I have nowhere been able to find. I have however persuaded the pious presbyter Bellator to write explanations, and he has said much in praise of this woman and others in two books." But of the work of this Bellator nothing is known, cf. Serarius, p. 680, ch. 8. In later ages, the expositors, older and more recent, of the Book of Judges, are also to be consulted on Ruth. Most prominent among these are the commentaries of RUPERT V. DEUTZ, SANCTIUS, Serarius, Grotius, Clericus, Rosenmüller, Maurer, Bertheau, and Keil.<sup>2</sup>

For special treatment of the Book of Ruth, the following are to be named: Christ. Aug. Heumann, Poecile, tom. i. 180, and ii. 383; J. W. Weinrich, Hist. und theol. Betrachtungen gelehrter Dinge, p. 237, etc.; Joh. Jac. Rambach, Notæ liberiores in libellum Ruthæ ex. rec. J. H. Michaelis in liberior. adnot. in Hagiographos, tom. ii. Halæ, 1720. The Collegium of Carpsov has already been mentioned.

The Book was translated [into German] and explained by Dereser, Frankfort, 1806, and by von Riegler, Würzburg, 1812. Compare Umbreit on the spirit and design of the Book, in the Studien und Kritiken, 1834, ii. In 1856 appeared: Metzger, Liber Ruth ex hebr. in lat. versus perpetuæque interpret. illustr. Tüb. 4.

Useful especially for teachers of Hebrew is: The Book of Ruth in Hebrew, with a critically revised Text, various Readings, including a new collation of twenty-eight Hebrew MSS., and a grammatical and critical Commentary; to which is appended the Chaldee Targum, etc., by Charles H. H. Wright, M. A., British Chaplain at Dresden. Leipzig, 1864.

[Wordsworth's Commentary mentioned in the Introduction to Judges contains notes on Ruth also. A Comment on Ruth, by Thomas Fuller, D. D., London, 1868 (originally published in 1654), is a homiletical production, abounding in striking thoughts quaintly expressed. It only extends, however, to the end of ch. ii. The Rich Kinsman, or History of Ruth, by S. H. Tyng, D. D., N. Y. — Tr.]

§ 6. Homiletical Introduction.<sup>3</sup>

The Book of Ruth is one of the smallest in the O. T., but abounds in material for homiletical instruction. It was admitted into the canon of Holy Scriptures not merely on account of its ultimate aim and issue, but also for the instructiveness of the narrative in itself. The O. T. points everywhere through history to completion, even as Christ himself says: I am the Way and the Truth, the Alpha and Omega.

<sup>3</sup> [Here, as in Judges, the author appended his "Homiletical Hints" in a body at the close of the Commentary. For the sake of convenience as well as uniformity, they have here also been distributed and placed in immediate connection

The Book of Ruth does not preach by means of mighty deeds of war inspired by faith, like those of Gideon and Samson, but by acts of love, which demand no less strength of soul. God can be praised not only with timbrels and trumpets, but also in quietness and silence. There is a heroism of faith in the family, at the sick-bed, and in grief for those we love, which is not inferior to that of Barak. Jephthah found it easier to triumph over Ammon than to subdue his sorrow on account of his daughter. It is often easier to die for the faith, than in the midst of men to live for it.

The Book tells of no prophetic woman like Deborah. But it tells of women whose hearts were capable of pure love, and such love is always prophetic. The fires which rouse a nation to enthusiasm glowed in Deborah; but in the women of our book burned the gentle flames of the household hearth, which distress and desertion cannot quench. The Book of Judges tells of a prophetess who was strong as a man; the Book of Ruth of a man who was tender as a woman.

No psalms lift up their lofty strains in the Book of Ruth. The scene of its history is not laid in the temple where the harp of God resounds, — its central figure is neither king nor poet. But the whole Psalter was born of suffering and love in God, like as David, the psalmist, descended from Ruth. A people must first have families in whom God is manifested forth by love and truth, before inspired singers can rise up from it to tune their harps with power. By the side of Sarah and Rebecca stands the retiring woman, who as Dante says (Parad. xxxii. 11), was

"Ancestress of the singer, who for dole
Of the misdeed said, Miserere mei."

Our Book contains no stern denunciations nor sorrowing lamentations over Israel, its people, princes, and priests; but deeply impressive, penetrating to the heart, is the instance it gives of suffering, love, and victory. It proposes not, like Daniel, to unveil the destinies of nations and the world; but at its close appears the Son of David into whose Godhood all history empties as the rivers into the ocean. No miracles occur in it like that of the three men in the fiery oven; but it tells of three believing ones, who in the glowing heat of suffering and temptation, were found strong and true.

THE BOOK OF RUTH.

CHAPTER FIRST.

VERSES 1-6.

Distress in a Foreign Land.

- 1 Now [And] it came to pass in the days when the judges ruled [judged], that there was a famine in the land. And a certain [omit: certain] man of Beth-lehem-judah went to sojourn in the country [territories<sup>1</sup>] of Moab, he, and his wife, and 2 his two sons. And the name of the man was Elimelech, and the name of his wife Naomi [Noomi],<sup>2</sup> and the name of his two sons Mahlon and Chilion, Ephrathites of Beth-lehem-judah. And they came into the country [territories] of Moab, and con-
3 tinued [lit. were, i. e., abode] there. And Elimelech Naomi's husband died; and she
4 was left, and her two sons. And they took them wives of the women of Moab [Moabitish wives]; the name of the one was Orpah, and the name of the other
5 Ruth: and they dwelled there about ten years. And Mahlon and Chilion died also both of them; <sup>3</sup> and the woman was left [behind]<sup>4</sup> of her two sons and her husband.
6 Then she arose with her daughters-in-law, that she might return [and returned] from the country [territories] of Moab: for she had heard in the country [territory] of Moab how [omit: how] that the Lord [Jehovah] had visited his people in giving [to give] them bread.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 1. — Prop. fields, plains. The form  $\text{שָׂדֵי}$  is variously explained. Bertheau regards it as another mode of writing  $\text{שָׂדֵי}$ , which occurs in ver. 6 of this chapter, and in ch. iv. 8, and according to Wright is in many MSS. found here also. The original  $\text{ש}$  of nouns derived from  $\text{שָׂדֵי}$  stems frequently reappears before suffixes (Ges. Gr. 93, 9, Rem.), and Berth. thinks that the same change is occasioned by the close connection of the word with the following genitive (cf. Ges. 89, 1). Ewald also takes  $\text{שָׂדֵי}$  to be singular, but derives it from the ancient form  $\text{שָׂדֵי}$ , the construct of which might be  $\text{שָׂדֵי}$  after the analogy of  $\text{בֵּית}$  const.  $\text{בֵּית}$ ,  $\text{בֵּית}$  const.  $\text{בֵּית}$ , etc. But  $\text{שָׂדֵי}$  is not found in Ruth, unless it be in the disguise of the construct, while  $\text{שָׂדֵי}$  occurs not less than nine times. Better, therefore, with Gesenius, Fürst, and others, take  $\text{שָׂדֵי}$  as plural construct of  $\text{שָׂדֵי}$ . Kell proposes to make  $\text{שָׂדֵי}$  plural const. of  $\text{שָׂדֵי}$ , pl.  $\text{שָׂדֵי}$  (which however is not found anywhere); for what reason does not appear, unless it be that the plural of  $\text{שָׂדֵי}$  is usually feminine, whereas  $\text{שָׂדֵי}$  is masc. But such irregularities are not uncommon; see Green, Gr. 200, c. The interchange of the singular and plural is readily accounted for from the meaning of the word, which, according to the more or less definite conception in the mind of the writer at the moment, may represent the territory as one great field or as made up of many smaller fields. — Tr.]

[2 Ver. 2. —  $\text{נוֹמִי}$ : Noomi, as the name should be written. Sept. Nœmiv; Vulg. Noemi. — Tr.]

[3 Ver. 5. — Better: "Then died they two also, Mahlon and Chilion." — Tr.]

[4 Ver. 5. —  $\text{שָׁרְיָה}$ : not, "was left from, i. e. was bereaved of," as Wright (with the Vulgate) interprets, — on the ground that the  $\text{בֵּן}$  changes the simple meaning of the verb as found in ver. 3.  $\text{בֵּן}$  has its proper partitive meaning, and points out the whole of which Naomi is now the only part left, cf. Deut. iii. 11; Neh. i. 2, 3. The enumeration of the whole is so far incomplete that it does not expressly include Naomi herself. In ver. 3 the verb is used without  $\text{בֵּן}$  because there is there no direct reference to the whole, but only the statement that at the death of her husband, she and her sons were left behind. — Tr.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Ver. 1. And it came to pass in the days when the judges judged. Nothing more definite is hereby expressed than that the occurrence about to be related took place in the time when there was yet no king in Israel. In those days there was no governor armed with imperative authority, who could help and discipline the whole people. Everybody did what he would, and helped himself in whatever way he thought best. Part of the tribe of Dan forsook the land in a body, because they were no longer pleased with it, and had no mind to overcome the remaining enemies; and Elimelech, an individual citizen, abandoned his home when the times became bad.

There was a famine in the land. No rain fell, and the crops did not prosper. Notwithstanding good and diligent cultivation, with which that at present observed in those parts is not to be compared, no harvests were reaped from those extensive grain-bearing plains which in good years produce abundant supplies.<sup>1</sup> In such seasons of scarcity, southern Palestine naturally resorted to importations from Egypt, as the history of Joseph has already shown. The increased prices, however, necessarily resulting from a failure of the home crops, pressed with two-fold weight on the less affluent among the people. And if, by hostilities on the part of the Philistines, or for any other reason, they were also cut off from the granaries of Egypt, nothing remained but to look for supplies in eastern countries. Even ancient Rome suffered famine whenever its connections with Egypt were interrupted, an occurrence which sometimes, as under Vespasian (Tacit. iii. 48, 5), involved serious political consequences.

The famine extended to the most fertile parts of the land, for it visited Bethlehem. The very name, "House of Bread," bespeaks a good and fertile district. Even yet, notwithstanding poor cultivation, its soil is fruitful in olives, pomegranates, almonds, figs, and grapes (Ritter, xvi. 287 [Gage's transl. iii. 341]). The region was "remarkably well watered in comparison with other parts of Palestine."<sup>2</sup> On this account, the name Ephrathah, applied to Bethlehem and the country around it, is perhaps to be explained as referring to the fruitfulness insured by its waters.<sup>3</sup>

And a man went. The man left Bethlehem with his family in the time of famine, in order, during its continuance, to sojourn in the fertile territories of Moab, on the eastern side of the Dead Sea, whither the calamity did not extend. For this the Jewish expositors rightly blame him. He left his neighbors and relatives in distress, in order to live in the land of the enemy; forsook his home, in order to reside as a stranger in Moab. If what he did was right, all Bethlehem should have done the same! The case stood very different, when Abraham for a like reason went to Egypt (Gen. xii. 10); for Abraham went with all his house, left no one behind, and was everywhere a stranger. But Isaac is already forbidden from adopting the same method of relief (Gen. xxvi. 2), and Jacob removes to Egypt, not on account of the famine, but because his lost Joseph has been found again. But this man undertakes, by his own strength and in selfish segregation from his fellows, to change the orderings of divine providence. The famine was ordained as a chastening discipline; but instead of repenting, he seeks to evade it by going to a foreign land. Whether this can be done, the ensuing narrative is about to show.

Ver. 2. And the name of the man was Elimelech. His family was of importance in the tribe of Judah (cf. chaps. ii. and iii.), well known in Bethlehem (ch. i. 19 ff.; iv. 1 ff.), and by no means poor (ch. i. 21). The names of its members may be held to testify to the same effect. In accordance with the spirit of Israelitish life, they may be supposed to reflect those obvious peculiarities which popular discernment remarked in the persons of those who bore them. The man is named Elimelech, "my God is King." All names compounded with "melech," king, with which we are acquainted, Abimelech, Ahimelech, etc., are borne by distinguished persons. Now, it was precisely in contest with a king of Moab, Eglon, that Israel had experienced that God is king; and yet, here an Elimelech withdraws himself from the favor of God in order to live in Moab! His wife's name was Naomi, "the lovely, gracious one." The name unquestionably corresponded to the character. Whoever is loved as she was, and that by daughters-in-law, is most certainly worthy of love. As to the names of the sons, Mahlon and Chilion, the derivations which make them signify "sickly" and "pining," suggested perhaps by their subsequent fate, are undoubtedly erroneous. For, surely, they bore them already when in Bethlehem, after leaving which they continued in life over ten years in Moab. It is much more likely that by these names, bestowed at birth, the parents expressed the feeling that these sons were their "joy" and "ornament." Mahlon (properly Machlon) may then be derived from מַחֲלוֹן, machol, "circle-dance," Greek choros. Comp. 1 Kgs. iv. 31, where Heman, Chalcol, and Darda, are called sons of Machol; and in Greek, Choregis or Chorokles, from choros. In like manner, Chilion<sup>4</sup> (or rather Kilion), may, like כַּלָּה, kallah, a bride, be referred to כֶּלֶל, to crown. The name would thus signify coronatus, just as kallah (bride) signifies a coronata. It is particularly stated that they are "Ephrathites" of Bethlehem-judah. Ephrathah was the ancient name of Bethlehem and the region around it. Accordingly, Ephrathites are natives of the city, persons properly belonging to the tribe of Judah, not mere residents in Bethlehem from other tribes (cf. Judg. xvii. 7).<sup>5</sup> So David also, by a use of the word in obvious accord with this passage, is spoken of as the son of an Ephrathite of Bethlehem-judah (1 Sam. xvii. 12); and the prophet, when he announces Him who in the future is to come out of Bethlehem, expressly speaks of Bethlehem-Ephrathah (Micah v. 1). For the same reason, the full name Bethlehem-judah is constantly used, in order to prevent any confusion with Bethlehem in Zebulun (Josh. xix. 15; cf. Com. on Judg. xii. 8), and also to make it impossible to think of Ephrathites of the tribe of Ephraim.

not only from the connecting "and": "they came to Moab, where there, and Elimelech died" (cf. the Com. on Judg. i. 1), but may also be inferred from the circumstance that the sons did not marry while he was yet living.

The death of the father is the beginning of the sad catastrophe; but notwithstanding its occurrence the sons are unwilling to return. On the contrary, they proceed, in violation of the Mosaic law, to take Moabitish wives (cf. Com. on Judg. iii. 6 f.). That such marriages fall within the prohibition of Deut. vii. 3 is not to be doubted. The restrictions of that passage apply to all who serve false gods, and the idolatry of Ammon and Moab is as strongly abominated as any other. That Moab and Ammon are not expressly named in the passage, is owing to the fact that it speaks with reference to the country on this side of the Jordan. In other passages, the worship and fellowship of Moab are rejected in the same way as those of the other nations (cf. Judg. x. 6). The question is not what name a people bears, but what its religion and worship are. No doubt, however, the old Jewish expositors are right when they maintain that the law which forbids the entrance of an Ammonite or Moabite into the congregation of Jehovah, even to the tenth generation (Deut. xxiii. 3), does not bear on the case of Ruth. For this can apply only to men, who from their sex are enabled to act independently, not to women, who are selected and taken. A woman founded no family in Israel, but was taken into one. For that reason, also, there is no connection whatever between this law and that in Deut. vii. 2 ff. Israel was forbidden to take wives for their sons from among the neighboring nations, not because these entered into the congregation or founded strange families, but because marriage is a covenant, and involves the danger of becoming mixed up with idolatry.

Inapplicable, likewise, to the present case is the passage in Deut. xxi. 10 ff., adduced by Le Clerc in defense of Naomi's sons. Doubtless, the fact that a woman was a captive taken in war gave marriage with her an altogether different character. In that case all the presuppositions which underlie the enactment in Deut. vii. were wanting. The woman, moreover, must first bewail her kindred as dead, before she is allowed to be married. But Ruth and Orpah were not captives. Marriage with them was in all respects such as Deut. vii. provided against. Nor does the narrative seek to hide the sin of the young men.<sup>1</sup> It is precisely, as we shall see, the most striking beauty of the thought of our Book, that the wrong which has been done is overcome, and turned into a stepping-stone to a great end. The Midrash makes a daughter of king Egion out of Ruth. Her heart at least is noble and royal as any king's daughter could be, and her exterior was doubtless such as to correspond with it.

The name of the one was Orpah, and the name of the other Ruth. The designation of girls by names borrowed from pleasing animals or flowers is common to all nations. The conjecture that Orpah, or Orpha, as the LXX. pronounce it, like Ophra, signifies a hind, is therefore undoubtedly in accordance with Moabitish usage. A comparison might apparently be made with cerva, Celtic caru (cf. Benfey, ii. 174). The name of Ruth would gain in interest, if the derivation which I propose, were approved. Singularly enough the name of the rose is not mentioned in the Scriptures, although this flower to this day adorns the ruins of the holy land with wondrous beauty. The Mishna and Talmud speak of it under its Greek name, ρόδον (cf. my Rose und Nachtigall, p. 19). Now it seems to me that in רוּת we have the ancient form of the word ρόδον, rosa, undoubtedly derived from the redness of the flower, ῥοδός, rutilus, Sanskrit rudh-ira, Gothic rauds (Benfey, ii. 125). That even the so called Semitic and classical languages have many words and roots in common, especially such as denote common objects, as colors, animals, plants, is manifest from numerous instances, as ε. γ. ἀλφός, albus, לָבָן.

At all events, the thought of Ruth as the Moabitish Rose is in itself, apart from the philological probability, too attractive to refrain from giving expression to the conjecture.<sup>2</sup>

And they dwelt there about ten years. The selection of such maidens as the sequel shows Ruth and Orpah to be, and the peaceful relations which must have existed between all parties concerned, may perhaps be allowed to reduce the offense of Naomi's sons against the marriage law to its mildest form. But the distance at which they keep themselves from their native land and people when these are in distress, in order to find happiness and rest for themselves elsewhere, does not prove productive of blessings. The lot that befalls them is very sad. The father, who feared lest he should not be able to live at home, had scarcely reached the strangers' land before he died. The sons founded their houses in Moab, and Moab became their grave. They were probably determined not to return home before the famine was over; and when it was over, they themselves were no more. The father had emigrated in order to have more and to secure his family; and now his widow had neither husband, nor sons, nor property. Mahlon and Chilion had died childless; "joy" and "ornament" had given way to mourning and the signs of bereavement—Naomi stood alone in a foreign land. Then she arose with her daughters-in-law.

Ver. 6. For Jehovah had visited his people to give them bread. Believing Israel sees the government of God in everything. Everything comes from Him and is designed to discipline and instruct mankind. In Deut. xxviii. 47, 48, it is written that in case Israel shall apostatize from God and cease to serve Him, it shall serve its enemies, and that in hunger and thirst, in nakedness and want. That the famine which had at this time befallen Bethlehem was the consequence of one of those military tyrannies which, as the Book of Judges relates, chastised the people, there is not the least indication. But a chastisement it certainly was, even though this is not asserted. And doubtless, the people, as it usually did under such circumstances, turned with penitence and prayer to its God. Then the years of famine came to an end. God remembered his people. It is a judgment of God when He allows men to go their own ways and help themselves in their necessities and sufferings (cf. the ἡμετέρας, Acts, xvii. 30); but in his mercy He remembers them, as he remembered Israel in Egypt (Ex. ii. 24). The word נָסָה here used, occurs repeatedly for such a return of divine remembrance. God remembered (נָסָה) Sarah, silently mourning over her childlessness (Gen. xxi. 1). After Moses had performed wonders before Israel in Egypt, the people believed, and when they heard that God had observed (נָסָה) the sufferings of the people, and had looked upon their affliction, they bowed down and worshipped (Ex. iv. 31).

<sup>1</sup> The Targum justly brings it into full relief. [It paraphrases: "and they transgressed the command of the Lord, and took foreign wives from among the daughters of Moab."] The answers of Le Clerc are misunderstandings, which have been repeated down to Bertheau. Rambach's excuses for the brothers are already offered by older Roman Catholic expositors. "But," says one of these (cf. Serarius, p. 680), "why make excuses for them? for Scripture does in no way represent them as holy men."

From the turn of the language that God "remembered" to "give bread" to his people, more particularly to Bethlehem, the "House of Bread," it may properly be inferred that the famine was not the result of war, but of drought.

NOTE ON BETHLEHEM AND THE GRAVE OF RACHEL. "No one," says Robinson (Bibl. Res. i. 471), has ever doubted, I believe, that the present Beit Lahm, 'House of Flesh,' of the Arabs, is identical with the ancient Bethlehem, 'House of Bread,' of the Jews. The present distance of two hours from Jerusalem corresponds very exactly to the six Roman miles of antiquity." Schubert justly calls it the most attractive and significant of all the world's birthplaces.

This Bethlehem, where Rachel died, where Boaz married Ruth, where David was born, and Jesus Christ entered the world, is to-day, as Ritter remarks, a little city or village "hardly worthy of mention on its own account, having scarcely a single noteworthy characteristic, except the unchanging carpet of green, and the beautiful sky from which once the glory of the Lord shone round about the shepherds."

Bethlehem lies two short hours south of Jerusalem, on two moderate-sized hills, on whose northern and eastern declivities the dwelling-houses of the place are built. It is bounded on the south by the Wady et Taamirah. During the reign of the emperor Justinian it flourished greatly for a season, which, however, did not prove long. Its present inhabitants are mostly Christians. They are a strong and energetic race. During the Middle Ages, warlike feuds seem to have given the place a better title to be called Bethlachem, House of War, than Bethlehem.

Toward the west, there is a succession of irregular hills and valleys as far as the chapel over Rachel's sepulchre. The Jews considered this as an especially sacred spot.<sup>1</sup> The monument is described by Benjamin of Tudela, who visited Palestine somewhere between A. D. 1160 and 1173, as consisting of "eleven stones, according to the number of the sons of Jacob, with a cupola resting on four pillars over them; and all passing Jews write their names on the stones of the monument" (ed. Asher, p. 40). The Jewish traveller Petachia (circa A. D. 1175-80), writes as follows: "Eleven stones lie on the grave of Rachel, according to the eleven tribes, for Benjamin was only born as his mother died. The stones are of marble; and the stone of Jacob, also marble, covers all the others, and is very large, so that it requires many persons to move it." This induces the author to add the following legend: "The monks who live a mile away, once took the stone from the grave, and deposited it by their church; but the next morning they saw it again at the grave as before" (ed. Carmoly, p. 97).

The author of Jichus ha Abot gives a description of the cupola as it was in his time (cf. Hottinger, Cippi Hebraici, p. 33, Carmoly, Itinéraires, etc., p. 436). The Arabian traveller Edrisi (about A. D. 1150; ed. Jaubert, i. 345) and another anonymous writer (Fundgruben des Orients, ii. 135; Carmoly, p. 457) also speak of it.

Buckingham's description (A. D. 1816) is as follows: "We entered it on the south side by an aperture through which it was difficult to crawl, as it has no doorway, and found on the inside a square mass of masonry in the centre, built up from the floor nearly to the roof, and of such a size as to leave barely a narrow passage for walking around it. It is plastered with white stucco on the outer surface, and is sufficiently large and high to enclose within it any ancient pillar that might have been found on the grave of Rachel. Around the interior face of the walls is an arched recess on each side, and over every part of the stucco are written and engraved a profusion of names, in Hebrew, Arabic, and Roman characters." (Cf. Palestine, i. 336.)

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

"A man of Bethlehem-judah went to sojourn in Moab." Because there is famine at home, the family of Elimelech migrate to a foreign country. They alone think that the distress cannot be borne. Instead of crying to God and trusting in Him, along with their brethren, in Bethlehem, they proceed to an enemy's land, where heathen worship false gods. Their emigration testifies to a decrease in their faith. Here it is not, as in the case of Abraham, Go to a land that I will show thee; but it must rather be said, They went to a land that God had rejected. The result was such as might have been expected. God did not bless their departure, and therefore their entrance brought no joy. They sought to avoid one affliction, and fell into a heavier. The men escaped famine, but death overtook them. They had not trusted God's love at home, and so his judgments smote them abroad.

Results like these should also be contemplated by many who undertake to emigrate in our days. Not many go as Abraham went to Canaan, or as Jacob went to Egypt; the majority follow in the steps of Elimelech.

Continue in thy land, and support thyself honestly. "To marry" — says a book called Sabbatliche Erinnerungen, — "it may be a necessity to leave their native land, for the relations of life are manifold and often strange; but most of those who in these days seize the pilgrim-staff, are not driven by distress. It is not hunger after bread, or want of work that urges them, but hunger after gain, and the want of life in God."<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> [They do still. Dr. Hackett, who visited the tomb in 1862, says: "The Jews, as would be expected, regard the spot with peculiar interest. One of them filled a bag with earth collected near the tomb, and gave it to one of my travelling companions to bring home with him to this country, as a present to a brother of the Jew residing here."]

See Scripture Illustrations, Boston, 1855, p. 102, where a small engraving of the present exterior of the sepulchre is also given — Tr.]

STARKE: Dearth and famine are a great plague, and we have good reason to pray with reference to them, "Good Lord, deliver us!"

It is true, indeed, that Elimelech emigrated to a heathen land, where the living God was not acknowledged, while emigrants of the present day go for the most part to lands where churches are already in existence. But, on the other hand, Elimelech, notwithstanding his unbelieving flight, became after all no Moabite. The emigrant's grand concern should be not to have the spirit of a Moabite when he leaves his native land. Many have ended much more sadly than Elimelech, and have left no name behind. Elimelech's kindred was yet visited with blessings, because the faithful, believing spirit of an Israelitish woman, Naomi, worked in his household.

STARKE: Husband and wife should continue true to each other, in love and in sorrow, in good and evil days.

"And the name of his wife was Naomi." Naomi means, "pleasant, lovely." As her name, so her character. Her name was the mirror of her nature. And truly, names ought not to be borne in vain. [FULLER: Names are given to men and women, not only to distinguish them from each other, but also, — 1. To stir them up to verify the meanings and significations of their names. Wherefore let every Obadiah strive to be a "servant of God," every Nathaniel to be "a gift of God," Onesimus to be "profitable," every Roger "quiet and peaceable" (?) Robert "famous for counsel" (?), and William "a help and defense" to many. 2. To incite them to imitate the virtues of those worthy persons who formerly have been bearers and owners of their names. Let all Abrahams be faithful, Isaacs quiet, Jacobs painful, Josephs chaste; every Lewis, pious; Edward, confessor of the true faith; William, conqueror over his own corruptions. Let them also carefully avoid those sins for which the bearers of the names stand branded to posterity. Let every Jonah beware of frowardness, Thomas of distrustfulness, etc. If there be two of our names, one exceedingly good, the other notoriously evil, let us decline the vices of the one, and practice the virtues of the other. Let every Judas not follow Judas Iscariot, who betrayed our Saviour, but Judas the brother of James, the writer of the General Epistle; each Demetrius not follow him in the Acts who made silver shrines for Diana, but Demetrius, 3 John, ver. 12, who had "a good report of all men;" every Ignatius not imitate Ignatius Loyola, the lame father of blind obedience, but Ignatius, the worthy martyr in the primitive church. And if it should chance, through the indiscretion of parents and godfathers, that a bad name should be imposed on any, O let not "folly" be "with" them, because Nabal is their name. . . . In the days of Queen Elizabeth, there was a royal ship called "The Revenge," which, having maintained a long fight against a fleet of Spaniards (wherein eight hundred great shot were discharged against her), was at last fain to yield; but no sooner were her men gone out of her, and two hundred fresh Spaniards come into her, but she suddenly sunk them and herself; and so "The Revenge" was revenged. Shall lifeless pieces of wood answer the names which men impose upon them, and shall not reasonable souls do the same? — Tr.]

[Br. HALL: Betwixt the reign of the judges, Israel was plagued with tyranny; and while some of them reigned, with famine. Seldom did that rebellious people want somewhat to humble them. One rod is not enough for a stubborn child.

FULLER: The prodigal child complained, "How many hired servants of my father have bread enough, and I die for hunger!" So here we see that the uncircumcized Moabites, God's slaves and vassals, had plenty of store, whilst Israel, God's children (but his prodigal children, which by their sins had displeased their Heavenly Father), were pinched with penury.

THE SAME: Let us not abuse strangers, and make a prey of them, but rather let us be courteous unto them, lest the barbarians condemn us, who so courteously entreated St. Paul, with his shipwrecked companions, and the Moabites in my text, who suffered Elimelech, when he came into the land, to continue there.

THE SAME: "And Elimelech died." I have seldom seen a tree thrive that hath been transplanted when it was old.

THE SAME: "And she was left, and her two sons." Here we see how mercifully God dealt with Naomi, in that He quenched not all the sparks of her comfort at once, but though He took away the stock, He left her the stems. Indeed, afterwards He took them away also; but first He provided her with a gracious daughter-in-law. — Tr.]

<sup>1</sup> [Without questioning the correctness of the foregoing remarks, it may nevertheless serve a good purpose to call attention to the following sentences from Dr. Thos. Fuller (1664), which read to-day suggest the great need of that caution in "application" which they also exemplify: "Now if any do demand of me my opinion concerning our brethren which of late left this kingdom to advance a plantation in New England; surely I think, as St. Paul said concerning virgins, he had 'received no commendment from the Lord'; so I cannot find any just warrant to encourage men to undertake this removal; but think rather the counsel best that king Joash prescribed to Amaziah. 'Tarry at home.' Yet as for those that are already gone, far be it from us to conceive them to be such to whom we may not say, 'God speed,' as it is in 2 John verse 10: but let us pity them, and pray for them; for sure they have no need of our mocks, which I am afraid have too much of their own miseries. I conclude therefore of the two Englands, what our Saviour saith of the two wines, Luke v. 39: 'No man having tasted of the old presently desireth the new: for he saith, The old is better.' — Tr.]

VERSES 7-18.

7. Wherefore [And] she went forth out of the place where she was, and her two daughters-in-law with her;<sup>1</sup> and they [already] went on the way to return unto the land of Judah. And Naomi said [Then said Naomi] unto her two daughters-in-law, Go, return each to her mother's house: the Lord [Jehovah] deal kindly with you.<sup>2</sup> 8 as ye have dealt with the dead, and with me. The Lord [Jehovah] grant you that ye may find<sup>3</sup> rest [a resting-place], each of you in the house of her husband. Then she kissed them; and they lifted up their voice, and wept. And they said unto her, 11 Surely<sup>4</sup> we will return with thee unto thy people. And Naomi said, Turn again [Return], my daughters: why will ye go with me? are there yet any more sons in 12 my womb, that they may be your husbands? Turn again [Return], my daughters, go your way [omit: your way]; for I am too old to have [to belong (again) to] an husband. If [Even if] I should say,<sup>5</sup> I have hope, if I should have [should belong to] an husband also to-night, and should also bear sons; would ye [then]<sup>6</sup> tarry for them [omit: for them] till they were grown? would ye stay for them [would you then shut yourselves up] from having husbands [in order<sup>7</sup> (after all) not to belong to a husband]? nay, my daughters; for it grieveth me much for your sakes [it is much more bitter to me than to you],<sup>8</sup> that [since] the hand of the Lord [Jehovah] 14 is gone out against me. And they lifted up their voice, and wept again.<sup>9</sup> And 15 Orpah kissed her mother-in-law [and turned back]; but Ruth clave unto her. And she [Naomi] said, Behold, thy sister-in-law is gone back unto her people, and unto her 16 gods [God]:<sup>10</sup> return thou [also] after thy sister-in-law. And Ruth said, Entreat [Urge] me not to leave thee, or [and] to return from following after thee: for whither thou goest, I will go; and where thou lodgest [abidest], I will lodge 17 [abide]: thy people shall be [is] my people, and thy God my God: Where thou diest, will I die, and there will I be buried: the Lord [Jehovah] do so to me, and 18 more also, if<sup>11</sup> ought but death part thee and me. When [And when] she saw that she was steadfastly minded to go with her, then she left speaking unto [ceased to dissuade] her.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 7. — From this verse, and the preceding (cf. also ver. 10), it appears plain, as Bertheau remarks, that not only Naomi, but also both her daughters-in-law, set out with the intention of going to Judah. It may be true that Naomi, determined from the start that they must not carry out this intention, "looked upon them as only bearing her company for a while before parting" (Dr. Cassel, below); but it seems at least as likely that in the struggle between duty and inclination, she did not finally reach this conclusion until the moment that she attempted to give it effect. The לְשׁוֹבָהּ is of course strictly applicable only to Naomi. — Tr.]

[2 Ver. 8. — יְיָ יֵעָשֶׂה יְהוָה עִמָּךְ חֲסֵד: lit. Jehovah do kindness with you. On the form יְעָשֶׂה as optative, cf. Ges. 127, 3, b. Although the shortened form יַעַשׂ is more usual, its substitution by the Keri is unnecessary.

In עִמָּךְ the suffix is masc., although referring to women, cf. also עִשְׂתֶּיכֶם in the next member of the clause. Similar departures from strict grammatical propriety occur in vers. 9, 11, 13, 19, 22, ch. iv. 11. Gesenius regards them as originally colloquial inaccuracies, which afterwards passed into books, § 121, 6, Rem. 1. All but two (vers. 19, 22) of those in our Book are actually found in conversations.

[3 Ver. 9. — וְיָשָׁבְנָה, imperat. scriptio defect. for וְיָשָׁבְנָה. On the construction, cf. Ges. 130, 1. The imperat. is only a stronger jussive, hence easily connected with it. — Tr.]

[4 Ver. 10. — וְ: Dr. Cassel first supplies: "We will not turn back," and then renders וְ by dena, "for," cf. Ges. Lex. s. v. וְ, B. 3, b. In that case, however (after the implied negation), sondera, "but," would be better than "for." But it is best taken like וְ in N. T. before words directly quoted, cf. Ges. l. c. B. 1, b. Kell's remark, that "וְ before words in direct discourse serves to strengthen, being almost equal to an assurance," is certainly not true in all cases, cf. 1 Sam. x. 19; 1 Kgs. xi. 22. — Tr.]

[5 Ver. 12. — וְ אִם יִהְיֶה: וְ is causal, and introduces another but closely connected reason (the first, also introduced by וְ, being given in the preceding clause) why they should return, cf. Isa. vi. 5; Ps. xxii. 12. In English, we should represent this וְ — וְ by "for—and." וְיָשָׁבְנָה, וְיָשָׁבְנָה, and וְיָשָׁבְנָה are all conditional perfects, with the conditional particle omitted, as in Ps. lxi. 83; ciii. 16; Amos iii. 8, etc. Cf. Ew. 367 b. In English we might imitate the sentence thus: "For (let us suppose) I say, I have hope; I have a husband; I have children; will you," etc.]

[6 Ver. 13. — הִלָּחֵן is the fem. suffix הֵן, used as a neuter (cf. Ges. 107, 8), with prep. לְ and the interrogative לָּ: "under these circumstances," or briefly "then," as inserted in the text after Dr. Cassel. The word in this sense is not unusual in Chaldee, cf. Dan. ii. 6, 9, 24; Ezra v. 12. In Hebrew it is found again at Job xxx. 24. As it occurs here in the colloquy of Naomi with her daughters, it is probably to be regarded as a word current in the language of daily life. See Kell, Introd. to O. T. § 137, 2. The rendering of the E. V. (after Sept., Vulg., etc.), "for them," is very improbable, both on account of the position of the word, the emphasis being clearly on "wait," and also because of its fem. suffix. — Ta.]

[7 Ver. 13. — לְבִלְתִּי, lit. "to not," Dr. Cassel, sm. לְבִלְתִּי expresses negative design, as לְמַעַן positive. The necessary result is here represented as designed, cf. the use of ita, Win. 53, 10, 6. — Ta.]

[8 Ver. 13. — כִּי־מְרִירִי מְאֹד מִנִּי: Dr. Cassel interprets rather than renders: "for I am much worse off than you, since against me," etc. Substantially the same rendering is given by Kell, De Wette, Wright, Wordsworth, etc. "So Sept., which has καὶ ὑπὲρ μου, not καὶ ὑπὲρ σου, and so Syr. and Arabic" (Wordsworth). Berthieu, like E. V. takes מִנִּי = on your account, for your sake. The objection that this would require עָלַיְכֶם instead of מִנִּי (cf. 2 Sam. i. 26), does not hold, cf. Prov. v. 18; Eccles. ii. 10, etc. But the other rendering yields a better sense. מִנִּי may be adjective, noun, or verb, viz. 3 sing. perf. of מָרַר, used impersonally. — Tr.]

[9 Ver. 14. — עוֹד: Dr. Cassel — "exceedingly." But there is no good reason to change the English "again," referring to ver. 9. — Ta.]

[10 Ver. 15. — אֱלֹהֵיהֶן: Sept. and Vulg. render by the plural, "gods." Luther has the sing., and so Dr. Cassel. The reference is apparently to the national deity — "her people and her god" — namely, Chemosh (Num. xxi. 29): hence, the sing. is to be preferred. It seems almost superfluous to observe that Naomi's words do not necessarily contain any recognition of the Moabitish deity, or indicate (as Wright suggests) that "she was possibly led astray by the false idea that Jehovah was only the God of Israel." Was Jephthah, then, similarly led astray (cf. Judg. xi. 24, 27)? — Tr.]

[11 Ver. 17. — כִּי is not "if" (אִם, 1 Sam. iii. 17, etc.), but "that," cf. 1 Sam. xiv. 44; 1 Kgs. ii. 28. אֲשָׁפְתִּי, "I swear," or some such expression, is understood, cf. Gen. xxii. 15. The E. V. might be corrected by leaving כִּי untranslated, and rendering: "only death shall part thee and me." The Hebrew, instead of invoking a definite judgment or calamity on himself, in case he breaks his oath, simply says פָּרוּחַ, which with the addition "and more too," is perhaps more awful to the imagination because it is not definite. — On the article with "death," cf. Ges. 109, Rem. 1. c. — Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Ver. 7. And she went forth out of the place. The place is not named, nor is it necessary. The Israelitish family had after all not become naturalized in it. No one asks Naomi to stay. No one accompanies her, save her two daughters-in-law, the youthful widows of her too early faded sons.

And they already went on the way. Until then Naomi had looked on her daughters-in-law as only bearing her company for a while before parting. But being now far from their place of residence, on the highway from Moab to Judah, she stops, and bids them return.

Ver. 8. Jehovah deal kindly with you, as ye have dealt with the dead and with me. A scene now begins of unequalled tenderness and amiableness. We get a look into a family-life that may serve as a model for all. It is an honor to the deceased sons, Mahlon and Chilion, that they made such a selection of wives; but they must also have been worthy of the enduring love they awakened, notwithstanding that there were no children to strengthen the bonds of affection. The attachment of the Moabitish women, Ruth and Orpah, to their new family, must be grounded in psychological facts, with a knowledge of which exegesis cannot dispense. The Moabitish women had entered into an Israelitish house, and had breathed the beneficent atmosphere of a family of Judah. Marriage and family life form the real mirror of religious belief and worship. Hence, the apostle, in his sublime manner, arranges the relations of husband and wife by referring to the love of Christ for his church (Ephes. v. 22 ff.). Ancient Israel, therefore, distinguished itself from the inhabitants of Canaan, not merely by the name of its God, but by its life at home in the family, by faithfulness and love to wife and child. Purity and morality in marriage were the necessary results of faith in the only, living God, as much as a life of unchaste and sensual pleasures belonged to the abominations of idolatry among the Ammonites and Moabites. Among the worst sins into which Israel fell in the desert, was the whoredom with the daughters of Moab in the service of Baal-Peor (Num. xxv.); by executing summary and terrible punishment on which, Phinehas the priest won for himself an enduring blessing. The Mosaic law does not contain special and extended instructions as to the treatment of wife and child. But the command, "thou shalt not commit adultery," stands among the Sinaitic Ten as the reflection of that other which says, "thou shalt have no other gods." An affectionate, moral family life had become an Israelitish characteristic through the influence of the Israelitish faith, as is evident already in patriarchal times from the instances of Sarah, Rebecca, Rachel and Leah. But it showed itself still more brightly in Israel as a nation, living by the side of other tribes in Canaan, since monogamy had become its natural and prevailing practice. Every profounder apprehension of domestic relations, brought about by man's consciousness of God, affects the wife especially. She experiences most deeply the beneficence of a life sanctified by the law of God. Her happiness and her love, indissolubly connected, depend upon the moral education of the man she follows. Ruth and Orpah felt the impression of the higher morality which, in contrast with the Moabitish home, pervaded every Israelitish household. It is not necessary to conceive of Mahlon and Chilion as men of eminence in this respect; but they held fast to their family traditions, according to which the wife occupied a position of tenderness, protected by love and solicitude. They did not act in entire accordance with the law when they married Moabitish wives; but neither did they unite with them in the idolatry of Baal-Peor. Although they may not have been specially pious and god-fearing men, their national mode of home and married life nevertheless contrasted with that of Moab, and all the more strongly because they lived in the midst of Moab. Both the young women, acquainted with the fate of Moabitish marriages, felt themselves gratefully attracted to the Israelitish house into which they entered. They had not accepted the law and the God of Israel; but they requited the kind and tender treatment they received with equally self-sacrificing love. That Naomi can acknowledge this, after having observed them through ten years of married life, what a picture of peace and happiness does it suggest! The women had not only heard the religion of Jehovah confessed in Moab (cf. the expression: Jehovah deal kindly with you, etc.), but they had seen the expression of it in the life. What they have done and are yet ready to do, is the consequence thereof. For national divisions, we here see, are overcome rather by the preaching of the life than by the verbal proclamation of doctrine.

Naomi praises not only the love which Ruth and Orpah have manifested toward their husbands, but also that which they have shown towards herself, the mother-in-law. And this is yet more noteworthy. Ancients and moderns unite in complaints of the unhappy relations between daughters and mothers-in-law. Plutarch, treating of the duties of married persons, relates that in Leptis, in Africa, it was customary for the bride on the day after the wedding to send to the bridegroom's mother to ask for a pot, which the latter refuses, pretending that she has none, in order that the young wife may speedily become acquainted with the stepmotherly disposition of her mother-in-law, and be less easily provoked when subsequently more serious troubles arise.<sup>1</sup> In Terence (Hecyra, ii. 1, 4), Laches laments "that all mothers-in-law have ever hated their daughters-in-law" (uno animo omnes socrus oderunt nurus).<sup>2</sup> Juvenal, in his satire against women (vi. 231), says, in a rather coarse way, that matrimonial peace is inconceivable so long as the mother-in-law lives (desperanda salva concordia socru). Old German popular sayings faithfully reproduce the ancient maxims: "Die Swiger ne weiss, dass sie Snur gewesen" (the mother-in-law has forgotten that she was ever a daughter-in-law);<sup>3</sup> "Die beste Swiger ist die, auf deren Rock die Gänse weiden" (the best mother-in-law is one on whose gown the geese feed, i. e. who is dead).

The family life of Naomi with her daughters-in-law affords no trace whatever of such sad experiences. They mutually love each other—both during the lives of the husbands and after their decease,—although they belong to different tribes. The praise for this naturally belongs largely to the mother, whose kind and genial soul evidently answered to her beautiful name. Thus much may also be gathered from her further conversation with her daughters. But the unhappy relations between daughter and mother-in-law, elsewhere usual, must in general have been unknown in Israel. Otherwise the prophet could not represent it as a sign of the extremest social ruin that, as the son against the father, and the daughter against the mother, so the daughter-in-law rises up against the mother-in-law (Mic. vii. 6); a passage to which Christ alludes when he speaks of the effects to be brought about in social life by his gospel (Matt. x. 35).

Vers. 9, 10. Jehovah grant you that you may find a safe place. If he be truly worthy of love who amid his own sorrow still thinks of the welfare of others, then, surely, Naomi is worthy of love. She has been called upon to part with all that was dear to her, with husband and children. She stands quite alone in her advanced age. But even yet all partings are not over. She thinks that now also she must no longer allow herself to be accompanied by Orpah and Ruth. Both the daughters-in-law are yet young; should she take them with her into her uncertain lot! She has not the presumption to forget their future in thoughts about her own; nor the vanity to think that the widows of her sons should not marry again. The position of a single woman in antiquity was an unhappy one. It was altogether customary for youthful widows to marry again. Only a husband's house is the true asylum for a woman. There she finds protection, safety, and honor. That is the idea of the menuchah, the rest, which Naomi wishes that Jehovah may give each of them in the house of another husband. It is impossible to imagine a more beautiful expression of the end of marriage to a woman. The possession of a menuchah, an asylum of honor and freedom, is the highest happiness; the want of it, a terrible misfortune. Among other evils, Israel is told that in the event of disobedience it shall have no menuchah (Deut. xxviii. 65).<sup>4</sup> The holy land, if it be possessed in faith, is, as it were, the earthly house to which Israel has come, like a wife to the house of her husband. "Hitherto," says Moses, Deut. xii. 9, "you have not yet come unto the menuchah which Jehovah your God gives you." The desert had no place of rest, properly speaking: it was only the way, not the goal. Solomon was the first who could praise God for the complete gift of menuchah to his people (1 Kgs. viii. 56). It is true, Israel's highest menuchah is God, Jehovah himself and his redemption. He is the true goal of life. Says the prophet (Isa. xi. 10): "And it shall come to pass in that day: the Root of Jesse—to him shall the nations repair, and his menuchah is glory." And, hence, Christ also says, Matth. xi. 29: "I learn of me, that I am meek and lowly in heart, and you shall find rest (ἀνάπαυσις, menuchah) for your souls."

Such a menuchah Orpah and Ruth had enjoyed in the homes of their husbands; and they are, as it were, vocationless, if they find not another. It was in the natural course of ancient social life that they should marry again among the people to whom they belonged. Naomi thinks it wrong for her to take them away from that people. Turn back, she says; may the blessing of the God of Israel be with you even in the midst of Moab! May He grant you rest in the house of a new husband! And she kisses them, as the signal of parting (cf. ver. 14),—but a loud weeping arises. Naomi finds it hard to be obliged to leave these last dear friends whom she has become accustomed to regard as daughters. Orpah and Ruth are unwilling to turn back, unwilling to let the loved Naomi proceed alone on her solitary way through life. "We go with thee," they say, "to thy people."

Vers. 11-13. And Naomi said: Have I then yet sons in my womb? It is by means of two considerations that Naomi seeks to persuade her daughters-in-law to return: first, she holds out to them the prospect of new family connections in Moab; and, secondly, she shows them that all hope of renewed married happiness is ended if they go with her. The surprising delicacy with which this is done, is such as to show clearly how truly a religious love educates and refines. The ultimate cause of the grief occasioned by the necessity of impending separation, lies after all solely in the fact that Ruth and Orpah are Moabitesses. Naomi could not bear to tell them that if they, as daughters of Moab, went with her to Israel, they would find themselves in a less hospitable situation than they had hitherto enjoyed. She is too tender to remind these good children of the fact that Israel does not sanction connections with Moab. On this account, she had already suggested (ver. 8), with special emphasis, that they should return to Moab, each to her mother's house, thus putting the natural Moabitish mother over against herself, the Israelitish mother-in-law. She would thereby intimate to them, as delicately and indirectly as possible, that they could hope for nothing in Israel except what she herself could give; that they could enter into her house, indeed, but not into Israel's national life. Naomi's speech in vers. 12, 13, is a climactic utterance of grief,<sup>1</sup> which often says so many really unnecessary things, in order to conceal others which it dares not say. Orpah and Ruth are themselves aware of all that Naomi says to them in these verses. In wishing to go with her, they cannot possibly have a thought of building hopes on sons yet to be born to Naomi by another marriage. But—and this is what Naomi would make them feel—any other hope than this vain one, they as Moabitish women could not have in Israel. If I myself—she gives them to understand—could yet have sons, I would take you with me. My home would then be your home too. To me you are dear as daughters-in-law, whether in

1 The climax of grief shows itself in the climax of impossibilities adduced to show that she can have no other sons for Ruth and Orpah. In the first place she says, I am too old; but if I were not, I have no husband. But even if I had a husband, and brought forth children this very night, two of them, and they sons, would you wait till they were grown up, and shut yourselves in until they were marriageable! The word  $\text{שָׁטַח}$ , here used in the sense of shutting one's self in, does not occur again in Scripture, and receives its explanation only from its use in this sense in the later Hebrew. This meaning, however, is evidently very ancient. It is connected with  $\text{גֵּן}$ , garden, the  $\text{קָדֵשׁ}$ , which was closed in, hedged in. Ruth and Orpah would have had to look upon themselves as brides of the supposed sons of Naomi, and must therefore have been shut in. With this the explanation of the word  $\text{שָׁטַח}$  itself stands connected. Kallah means bride and daughter-in-law (as newly-married wife), in the same way as the Greek

Israel or in Moab, but other prospect have you none. Here where everything turns on love, the fulfiller of every law, Naomi does not think of the legal provisions with respect to levirate marriages; but she heaps up the improbabilities against her being able to furnish husbands to her daughters-in-law in Israel, in order in this veiled manner to indicate that this was nevertheless the only possible ground of hope for them in Israel.

For I am worse off than you are. It is very painful for Naomi to let them go, for she is entirely alone. But she cannot answer it to take them with her, seeing she can offer them no new home. Undoubtedly, she is in a worse situation than that of the young women. For them there is yet a possible future among their people. Naomi has buried her happiness in a distant grave. For her there is no future. The last of those dear to her, she herself must tear away from her heart. "Jehovah's hand," she says, "went forth against me." She is soon to experience that his mercy is not yet exhausted.

Ver. 14. But Ruth clave unto her. Orpah suffers herself to be persuaded, and goes; but Ruth remains, and will not leave her. The result of Naomi's tears is, that Orpah takes leave of her, and that Ruth clings to her only the more closely. The hopelessness of the future, on which the mother had dilated, leads Orpah back to Moab, but suffers Ruth to go with her to Israel. All that Naomi had said, her solitariness, poverty, sorrow, only served to attach her more firmly. Orpah too was attached and well disposed; but still, with eyes of love, although she had them, she yet saw herself, while Ruth saw only the beloved one. It might be said with a certain degree of truth, that the same cause induced Orpah to go and Ruth to remain, the fact, namely, that Naomi had no longer either son or husband. The one wished to become a wife again, the other to remain a daughter. Few among the natural children of men are as kind and good as Orpah; but a love like that of Ruth has scarcely entered the thoughts of poets. Antigone dies for love of her brother; but the life which awaited Ruth was more painful than death. Alcestis sacrifices herself for her husband, and Sigune (in the Parzival of Wolfram v. Eschenbach) persistently continues in a solitary cell, with the corpse of her lover whom she had driven into battle, until she dies; but Ruth goes to a foreign land and chooses poverty, not for a husband or a lover, but for the mother of him who long since was torn away from her. She refuses to leave her for the very reason that she is poor, old, and childless. Naomi, having lost her sons, shall not on that account lose her daughters also. Rather than leave her to suffer alone, Ruth will starve with, or beg for her. Here is love for the dead and the living, surpassing that of Alcestis and Sigure. That Ruth does for her mother-in-law, what as the highest filial love the poet invents for Antigone, when he represents her as not leaving her blind father, is in actual life almost unexampled. Nor would it be easy to find an instance of a deeper conflict than that which love had to sustain on this occasion. The foundation of it was laid when Elimelech left his people in order not to share their woes. It was rendered inevitable, when, against the law of Israel, his sons took wives of the daughters of Moab. It broke out when the men died. Their love for their Israelitish husbands had made the women strangers in their native land; and the love of Naomi for her Moabitish daughters made her doubly childless in Israel. Nationality, laws, and custom, were about to separate mother- and daughters-in-law. But as love had united them, so also love alone has power to solve the conflict, but only such a love as Ruth's. Orpah escapes the struggle by returning to Moab; Ruth ends it by going with Naomi.

$\nu\mu\phi\eta$  (cf. Matt. x. 35, as also the rendering of the LXX. and the German Brant, Grimm, Wörterb. II. 832). The Greek  $\nu\mu\phi\eta$  explains itself from the Latin nubere, to cover, to veil. The bride already covered herself, like the wife, withdrew herself from the eyes of men, and was shut up. The goddesses themselves were originally called  $\nu\mu\phi\alpha\iota$  probably because they were conceived of as rendered invisible by the nature-covering of tree and fountain. The use of  $\sigma\upsilon\nu\nu\mu\phi\eta$ , for sister-in-law, by the LXX. in ver. 15, is peculiar, and doubtless intended to mean "the other, second, the sister-daughter-in-law," rather than "the sister-in-law." In classic authors it does not occur; for in  $\sigma\upsilon\nu\nu\mu\phi\eta$ , the  $\sigma\upsilon\nu$  refers to  $\kappa\acute{o}\mu\omicron\varsigma$ . The Hebrew bride derives her name from the garland with which it was customary to crown both bride and bridegroom (cf. Mader, de Coronis, Helms. 1862, p. 85, etc.). The symbolism of the word contains profound poetical ideas. It represents a shutting in, it is true; but by flowers,—a shutting up unto perfection and coronation.

Ver. 15. Thy sister-in-law returned home to her people and to her God. In these remarkable words lies the key to the understanding of vers. 11-13. Her daughters had said to her (ver. 10), "We will go with thee to thy people." It grieves Naomi to be obliged to tell them, with all possible tenderness, that in the sense in which they mean it, this is altogether impossible. It was necessary to intimate to them that a deeper than merely national distinction compels their present parting: that what her sons had done in Moab, was not customary in Israel; that her personal love for them was indeed so great, that she would gladly give them other sons, if she had them, but that the people of Israel was separated from all other nations by the God of Israel. Orpah understood this. Strong as her affection for Naomi was, her natural desire for another resting-place in a husband's house was yet stronger; and as she could not hope for this in Israel, she took leave and went back. For the same reason, Naomi now speaks more plainly to Ruth: thy sister-in-law returned home to her people and to her God. It is not that we belong to different nations, but that we worship different Gods, that separates us here at the gates of Israel.

Vers. 16, 17. And Ruth said, Thy people is my people, and thy God my God. Naomi's house, her character and life, have won for her the love of her daughters-in-law. Ruth cleaves to her and will not leave her, although poverty and misery await her. For love to her she proposes to give up not only home and family, but also all the heart-joys that might there yet be hers. She cleaves to her thus, although she is of Israel. Naomi and her house have made Israel also appear lovely in the eyes of Ruth. Who would not wish to go to a people whose sole known representatives were so amiable as Naomi and her family! In Moab, the young women had not been made aware that one cannot be united to Israel without acknowledging Israel's God, for they had entered the marriage relation with sons of Israel without entering into covenant with their God. Now, however, they learn, from Naomi's intimations, that that which Mahlon and Chilion had done, was against the custom of Israel. The discovery instantly manifests itself in different effects on Orpah and Ruth. Orpah is repelled, because she thinks only of the bridal she might lose. Ruth is attracted; for if that which distinguishes this people which she already loves be its God, then she loves that God also. In Naomi she loves both people and God. Ruth's love is true love: it cleaves to Naomi not for advantages, but on account of her virtues and amiability. Ruth desires to be one with her for life. She will not let her be alone, wherever she may be. What Naomi has, she also will have, her people and her God. And this she expresses at once, so clearly and decidedly, that in ver. 17 she swears by Jehovah, the God of Israel. The Jewish expositors, after the example of the Targum, suppose a dialogue to have taken place in which Naomi has first explained to Ruth the difficulties connected with faith in the God of Israel. All this, however, should be considered merely as a didactic anticipation of her subsequent experiences. In our narrative, the confession of Ruth, "thy God is my God," is the highest stage of that devotion which she yields to Naomi for life. She has vowed that nothing shall separate her love from its object; for whatever could separate it, would make it imperfect. But since the God of Israel is the true ground of all the love which she felt for her Israelitish friends, it follows that her confession of Him is the keystone of her vow. It is at the same time the true solution of the conflict into which persons who mutually loved each other had fallen. It rectifies the error committed by her husband when he took the Moabitish woman notwithstanding her relation to the idol of Moab. The unity of the spirit has been attained, which not only shows true love, but even in memory reconciles what was amiss in the past. For Naomi's grief was so great, not only because she had lost her sons, but also because the daughters-in-law which she had must be given up, and she be left alone. And as love enforced the separation, so love also became the cord drawing to a yet closer union. If Naomi believed herself fallen out of the favor of God on Moab's account, she could derive comfort from Ruth who for her sake entered into the people of God.

Ver. 18. And when she saw that she was firmly resolved. Older expositors have imagined that Naomi's efforts to persuade her daughters-in-law to return homeward, were not altogether seriously meant. She only wished to test them. They take this view in order to free Naomi from the reproach of being too little anxious to introduce her daughters into Israel and the true faith (Rambach: Querunt hic Interpretes an recte fecerit Noomia, etc.).<sup>1</sup> But this whole exposition is a dogmatic anachronism. Naomi could entertain no thoughts of missionary work as understood in modern times, and for that she is not to be reproached. The great love on which the blessing of the whole narrative rests, shows itself precisely in this, that Naomi and her daughters-in-law were persons of different nationality and religion. This contrast — which a marriage of ten years has only affectionately covered up — it is, that also engenders the conflict of separation. During more than ten years the marriage of Naomi's sons to Moabitesses was and continued to be wrong in principle, although, in the happy issue of their choice, its unlawfulness was lost sight of. What she had not done then in the spring-tide of their happiness, Naomi could not think of doing now. Her generous love shows itself now rather in dissuading her daughters-in-law from going with her to Israel. For they surely would have gone along, if their deceased husbands, instead of remaining in Moab, had returned to Israel. But their death had in reality dissolved every external bond with Naomi. No doubt, Naomi now feels the grief which the unlawful actions of her husband and sons have entailed. Had her daughters-in-law been of Israel, there would naturally be no necessity of her returning solitary and forsaken. She feels that "the hand of Jehovah is against her." How indelicate would it be now, nay how unbecoming the sacredness of the relations involved, if Naomi, at this moment, when she is herself poor, and with no prospect in the future, were to propose to her daughters-in-law to leave not merely the land but also the god of Moab, that thus they might accompany her. If she had ever wished, at this moment she would scarcely dare, to do it. It is one of the symptoms of the conflict, that she could not do it. The appearance of self interest would have cast a blot on the purity of their mutual love. Naomi might now feel or believe what she had never before thought of, — she could do nothing but dissuade. Anything else would have rudely destroyed the grace and elevation of the whole beautiful scene. The great difference between Orpah and Ruth shows itself in the very fact that the one yields to the dissuasion, the other withstands. Ruth had the tenderly sensitive heart to understand that Naomi must dissuade; and to all Naomi's unuttered reasons for feeling obliged to dissuade, she answers with her vow. Naomi dissuades on the ground that she is poor, — "where thou abidest, I will abide," is the answer; that she is about to live among another people, — "thy people is my people;" that she worships another God, — "thy God is my God;" that she has no husband for her, — "only death shall part me from thee." Under no other circumstances could the conflict have found an end so beautiful. Naomi must dissuade in order that Ruth might freely, under no pressure but that of her own love, accept Israel's God and people. Only after this is done, and she holds firmly to her decision, does Naomi consent and "cease to dissuade her."

NOTE TO VERSE 8: "Jehovah deal kindly with you, as ye have dealt with the dead and with me." The love which unites husband and wife in marriage, reconciles the contrasts inherent in difference of nationality, makes peace, gives a good conscience, and leaves a blessed memory. Christian families, too, will do well to look upon the good understanding existing between Naomi and her daughters-in-law as an example to be followed. It originated in the right love of the wives for their husbands, and of the mother for her sons. A right love rejoices in the happiness of its objects, even though derived through others. The jealousy of mothers toward their children-in-law, and of wives toward their husbands' parents does not spring from love.

A pleasing instance of right relations with a mother-in-law comes to light in the gospel history. Jesus enters into the house of Peter, whose mother-in-law lies sick of a fever. Request is immediately made in her behalf, and He, always full of love ready to flow forth in miracles wherever He sees love, heals her (Matth. viii. 14 ff. and paral.). The term ἰατρεύειν, used in this account by the gospels, is also employed by the Sept. with reference to Naomi.

"Blessed is Ruth who so clung to her aged mother-in-law that she would not leave her until death. For this reason, Scripture indeed has justly extolled her; but God has beatified her forever. But He will judge, and in the resurrection condemn, all those wicked and ungodly daughters-in-law who deal out abuse and wrong to their parents-in-law, unmindful of the fact that they gave life and sustenance to their husbands. . . . If, therefore, thou lovest thy husband, O wife, then love them also who gave him being, and thus brought up a son for themselves and a husband for thee. Seek not to divide the son from his father or mother! Seek not to bring the son to despise or father or mother, lest thou fall into the condemnation of the Lord in the day of awful inquest and judgment."

But these excellent words never found the right echo. Even Jerome says: prope modum naturale est, ut nurus socrum et socrus oderit nurum. And yet it never was the case where Christian virtue was actually alive.

Monica, the mother of Augustine, had to endure not a little from her mother-in-law. The latter supported Monica's disobedient maid-servants against their mistress. She allowed them to bring her all sorts of evil reports about her. Her daughter-in-law she daily chided and provoked. But Monica met her with such complaisant love, quiet obedience, and amiable patience, as to conquer the irritable mother-in-law, so that she became, and continued to be to the last, the friend and protectress of her daughter-in-law. No wonder that from such a heart there sprang the faith and spirit of a man like Augustine (cf. Barthel, Monica, p. 31).

Not only the history, but also the traditions and the poetry, of the Middle Ages, frequently depict the sufferings of daughters-in-law, inflicted on them by the mothers of their husbands. As part of the "swan-legends" of the lower Rhine, we have the peculiar story of Matabruna, the bad wife of the king of Lilliefort, who persecuted and tormented her pious and believing daughter-in-law Beatrix, until at last the latter, by God's help, came off victorious (cf. Wolf, Niederländische Sagen, p. 175; also my treatise on the Schwan, p. 24).

Hermann Boerhaave's step-mother having died, the universally celebrated physician wrote as follows: "All the skill with which God has endowed me I applied, and spent whole half-nights in considering her disease, in order to prolong her life, — but all in vain. . . . But I weep too, as often as the thought occurs to me that now I shall have no more opportunity to show her my love, veneration, and gratitude; and I should be altogether inconsolable, if, since my coming of age, I had been even once guilty of disrespect or ingratitude toward her."

It may hence be seen how deeply grounded in the nature of things it is, that in German [and if in German, then in English too. — Tr.] glauben [to believe] and lieben [to love] are really of the same root. In Gothic, liubs means, "dear, beloved"; lu ban, "to be beloved." With this, the likewise Gothic laubjan, galaubjan, "to believe," is connected. In the version of Ulfilas, even ἀπισ, hope, is at Rom. xv. 13 translated by lubains. And in truth: Faith, Love, Hope, these three are one; but the greatest of them is Love.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

"Jehovah deal kindly with you, as ye have dealt with the dead and with me." Naomi's husband was dead. Her sons had married Moabitesses, and had died childless. Usually, and sometimes even in "believing" families, mothers-in-law and daughters-in-law are not on the best of terms. But Naomi, although in Moab, enjoyed such love in the house of her sons, that her daughters-in-law did not leave her, but went with her, and that Ruth, for her sake, left native land, parents, and property. She won love because she was Naomi, "pleasant." She cherished no vanity, sought no strife, and did not wish to rule; hence she had peace and love.

STARKE: "Piety, wherever found, has the power to win the hearts of people. It is able to diffuse joy even among those who do not believe."

Naomi was pleasant and pious. She illustrated the saying of the apostle Peter (1 Epis. iii. 1): "that, if any obey not the word, they may also without the word be won by the conversation of the wives." By her conduct she preached the God of Israel, "in a meek and quiet spirit," in the midst of Moab; and hence the love which she won redounded to the praise of Israel, and became a silent preaching of the truth to unbelievers.

STARKE: "As long as the Church is called Naomi, there is no lack of adherents; but when she appears as Mara, and is signed with the cross of Christ, many go back."

"And Ruth said, Thy people is my people, and thy God my God." Ruth is a prophecy, than which none could be more beautiful and engaging, of the entrance of the heathen world into the kingdom of God. She comes forth out of Moab, an idolatrous people, full of wantonness and sin, and is herself so tender and pure. In a land where dissolute sensuality formed one of the elements of idol worship, a woman appears, as wife and daughter, chaste as the rose of spring, and unsurpassed in these relations by any other character in Holy Writ. Without living in Israel, she is first elevated, then won, by the life of Israel, as displayed in a foreign land. Amid surrounding enmity and jealousy toward Israel, she is capable of being formed and attracted through love.

It is an undeniable fact that women have at all times entered more deeply than men into the higher moral spirit of the fellowship with God mediated by Christ. Women, especially, feel that marriage is a divinely instituted and sacred union. Their hearts teach them to know the value of the great treasure and consolation which faith in the living God gives to them especially. Ruth's confession of God and his people originated in the home of her married life. It sprang from the love with which she was permitted to embrace Israelites. It was because in these persons she loved the confessors of Jehovah, that her feelings had a moral power which never decays.

An ancient church teacher says: "Had she not been inspired, she had not said what she said, or done what she did. For what is she chiefly praised? For her love to the people of Israel or her innocence, for her obedience or her faith? For her love to the people of Israel. For had she desired marriage only as a means of pleasure, she would rather have sought to obtain one of the young men. But as she sought not sensual gratification, but the satisfaction of conscience, she chose a holy family rather than youthful age."

of one Israelitish woman in a foreign land, was able to cast forth a love and a confession of God, like that of Ruth. How imperative, then, the duty of Christians at home, and how easy of execution, to win Jews and other unbelievers. For love is the fountain of faith. It is written, Thou shalt love thy God with all thy heart. The Jews must learn to love Christ in the Christian, and the Christian in Christ. Love removes all prejudices, divisions, and sad remembrances. Ruth loves a woman, and is thereby led to the God whom that woman confesses. Must not men love, if they would be loved? Only love opens the fountain of faith, but faith sanctifies and confirms love.

PASCAL: "The heart has reasons which the reason does not comprehend. This is seen in a thousand things. It is the heart that feels God, not the reason. Hence, that is the more perfect faith which feels God in the heart."

Ruth is not only the type of a convert, but also a teacher of those who seek to convert others. For she shows that converts are made, not by words, but by the life, not by disputations, but by love, not by the legerdemain of a sentimental sermon, but by the faithful discharge of the duties of life. She teaches also by what she gives up,—people, home, parents, customs,—and all from love. She has had a taste of an Israelitish heart and household. Whoever has tasted Christ, can never again live without him,—can never leave him who loves all, suffered for all, weeps with all, and redeems all. If Jews and heathen taste him, this is effected, not through external institutions, through dead works, but through prayer, which fills the lives of Christians with its sweetness. To the fanatical, the disputations, the canting, the selfish, the avaricious,—and also to the characterless and slavish,—who would say: thy people is my people, thy God is my God?

"Where thou abidest, I will abide; where thou diest, I will die." Ruth is not only enrolled among the feminine worthies of Israel, with Sarah, Rebecca, Leah and Rachel, but heathenism itself throughout its vast extent cannot show a single woman who is her equal in love. For hers is a love outliving the grave, and sustained by no fleshly relationship, for when her husband was dead no living person, mutually dear, existed to connect her with Naomi. Neither self-interest, nor hope, nor vanity, mix themselves up with this love. It is a purely moral and spiritual love, of which no other instance is on record. It is in fact the love of those whom God by his mercy has won for himself, and who love God in their brethren. It is the evangelical love of the Apostles, who loved Greeks and Franks, Persians and Scythians, as their own flesh and blood. Such love as this followed the steps of our Lord, and tarried where he was. Confession, martyrdom, prayer, and every brotherly thought or deed, spring from the love of the converted heart. The more heartily the soul cries out to Christ himself, Thy people is my people, and thy God my God, the more fervently burns this love.

ZINZENDORF: I speak because I believe; I love, because many sins are forgiven me.

SAILER: Lead men through love to love. For love cultivates and preserves the true and the good by doctrine, life, prayer, watchfulness, and by a thousand other inventions of its inexhaustible genius.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[<sup>2</sup> Ver. 19. — וְהָיָה: fem. plural (cf. וְהָיָה, etc. in ver. 20). Not exactly, dicebantque mulieres, as the Vulg. has it; the population of the city are the subject of the verb, but in a matter of this kind women would naturally be so prominent as to lead the narrator insensibly to use the feminine. Perhaps Naomi arrived at an hour of the day when the labors of the field left none but women in the city. — Ta.]

[<sup>3</sup> Ver. 22. — וְהָיָה: Dr. Cassel translates the whole clause thus: "And so Naomi was returned home, and Ruth, the Moabitess, her daughter-in-law, with her, [who accompanied her] after [or on, cf. the Com. below] her departure from the fields of Moab." This rendering, is, of course, intentionally free, and is designed to indicate that what seems an unnecessary remark, really adds to the sense, namely, that Ruth was the (only) one that came to Naomi, that came with her from Moab. But this seems rather forced. As the same expression occurs, at ch. iv. 8, in connection with Naomi, it may be supposed that it became customary to speak of Naomi and Ruth as "the returned from Moab," or as we should say, popularly, "the returned Moabites." In that case, it would be best (with Berth.) to take וְהָיָה (accented in the text as 3d fem. perf., with the art. as relative, cf. Ges. 109, 2d paragr.), as the fem. participle. The epithet would be applied to Ruth by virtue of her connection with Naomi, cf. ver. 7. — Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Ver. 19. So they two went. Naomi said nothing more. She ceased to dissuade. She allowed Ruth to go with her, and the latter was as good as her words. She actually accompanied her mother-in-law; and so it came to pass, that Naomi did not return home alone, that is to say, entirely forsaken and helpless.

The whole city was moved about them. Naomi's return was an uncommon occurrence. The city, and especially the women, were thrown into a peaceable uproar. Everybody ran, told the news, and wondered. For more than ten years had passed since she had left Bethlehem. Then there had doubtless been talk enough, as Naomi went away with her husband, in far different and better circumstances. It may be taken for granted that even then her character had awakened sympathy and affection in Bethlehem. Her husband, we know, belonged to a prominent family of the city. All this renders it natural that the news that Naomi had returned to Bethlehem, poor and sorrowful, spread like wildfire, and created what to her was an unpleasant sensation.<sup>1</sup> "Is that Naomi!" is the universal exclamation.

Ver. 20. Call me not Naomi, call me Mara. Undoubtedly, the general astonishment over such a return, gave rise to many reflections which a woman especially would feel deeply. Not merely the external comparison of "then" and "now," but also the motives of the former departure are brought to mind. Then, Naomi's life and circumstances corresponded with the amiable and joyous name she bore. Now, she was better named Mara, the bitter, sorrowful one. It is evident that names were still preserved with conscious reference to their meaning. Naomi manifestly intends, by these and the following words, to inform the inhabitants of Bethlehem of her fortunes. I am no longer the old Naomi; for what of happiness I possessed, I have lost. I have no more anything that is pleasant about me: my life, like a salty, bitter spring, is without flavor or relish.

For the Almighty (Shaddai) hath inflicted bitter sorrow upon me. Why Shaddai? The use of this divine surname must here also be connected with its pregnant, proper signification. The explanation which must necessarily be given to it, is not consistent with its derivation from שָׁדַד, which always appears in a bad sense. What this explanation is, will become apparent when the passages are considered in which the name is first, and with emphasis, employed. We select, therefore, those of Genesis, in which book the name Shaddai occurs more frequently than in any other except Job, and always as designative of the gracious, fertile God, by whom the propagation of mankind is guaranteed. Thus, it is assumed by God in Gen. xvii. 1 ff. where he says to Abram, "I make thee exceedingly fruitful, — to a father of a multitude of nations," etc. So likewise, it occurs Gen. xxviii. 3: "El Shaddai will bless thee and make thee fruitful." Gen. xxxv. 11: "I am El Shaddai, be fruitful, and multiply." Gen. xlviii. 3: "El Shaddai appeared unto me—and said, Behold, I make thee fruitful and multiply thee." Gen. xlix. 25: "Shaddai shall bless thee—with blessings of the breasts (שְׁדֵי) and of the womb." For the same reason it is used at Gen. xliii. 14, where the fate of the children of Jacob is in question. This gracious God, the source of fruitfulness and life, gives his blessing to his chosen saints, but from sinners, and from those whom He tries, He takes away what to others He gives. Hence the frequent use of the name in Job, who is chastened in his children, cf. chap. viii. 3: "Will Shaddai pervert justice? If thy children sinned against Him, He gave them over into the hand of their transgressors." And in this sense Naomi also uses the name Shaddai, in speaking of her misery. For the death of her husband and her sons has rendered her family desolate and unfruitful. The word must therefore unquestionably be referred to a root שָׁדַד, still in use in Arabic, in the sense "to water, to fertilize." For that all fertility comes from water, by which aridity is removed and thirst assuaged, is a deeply rooted conception, especially in oriental antiquity. Numerous mythical pictures of heathenism represent their heroes as conquering drought and unfruitfulness by liberating the rain and the streams. The name of the Indian god Indra is derived from Ind = und, to flow, and is therefore equivalent to "the rain-giver," who frees the clouds so that they can dispense their showers (cf. E. Meier, Ind. Liederb., p. 147 f.). The true Rain-giver, the dispenser and increaser of fertility, of the earth and among beasts and men, is the living, personal God, as Shaddai. The root שָׁדַד must also explain שֶׁד, mamma, properly the fountain of rain and blessings for man and beast, as Gellius (xii. 1) calls it, fontem sanctissimum corporis, and the bringer up of the human race. Hence we are enabled to recognize the wide-spread philological root to which shadah, to water, shad (Aram tad), mamma, belong; for it is connected with the Sanskrit dhe, Greek θησθαι, Gothic dad-djan (Old German, tutta, etc., cf. Bensley, Gr. Gram. ii. 270), in all which forms the idea of giving drink, suckling, is present. From the Greek word, the name of the goddess Thetis is derived, as "Nurse of the Human Race" (cf. Welcker, Gr. Mythol., i. 618). That Artemis of Ephesus was represented as a multimamma, is known not only from antique sculptures, but also from the writings of the church fathers; cf. the words of Jerome (in Proem Ep. Pauli ad Ephes.): omnium bestiarum et viventium esse nutricem mentiuntur. Naomi was rightly named when, with a flourishing family, she went to Moab—but now Shaddai, who gave the blessing, has taken it away.

Ver. 21. I went out full, and Jehovah hath brought me home again empty. Full of family happiness, of joy in her sons, and of hope of a cheerful old age surrounded by children and children's children; but empty now of all these, without possessions and without hope. A penitent feeling pervades her lamentation. I went away notwithstanding my fullness, and because I went full, do I return empty. For this reason she says: "I went away, and Jehovah has brought me home again." I went because it was my will to go, not God's; now, God's judgment has sent me back. With that one word she gives vent to her sorrow that in those times of famine she forsook her people, although she herself was happy. What an evil thing it is to follow one's own will, when that will is not directed by the commandments of God! Man goes, but God brings home. But beside this penitential feeling, there is another feature indicative of Naomi's beautiful character, which must not be overlooked. She says, I went, me hath God afflicted; not, We went—my husband took me with him,—after all, I only followed as in duty bound. She utters not a breath of accusation against Elimelech or of excuse for herself. Properly speaking, the fault did lay with her husband and sons. They were the originators of the undertaking that ended so disastrously; but of this she has no memory. She neither accuses, nor yet does she commiserate and bewail them. Of the evils which they experienced, she does not speak. I went, and me has God brought home again, empty and bereft of husband and child. Therefore, she repeats, call me not Naomi! That name, when she hears it, suggests the entire contrast between what she was and what she now is.

יָעִקָּה בִּי. The internal connection with the preceding thoughts confirms the correctness of the Masoretic pointing. The reading of the LXX., "he humbled me," was justly departed from, for it is only a paraphrase of the sense.<sup>1</sup> That which Bertheau considers to be the difficulty of the passage, that it makes God to testify against a person, while elsewhere only men bear testimony, is precisely the special thought of Naomi: "I went," she says, "and God has testified that this going was a sin. Through the issue of my emigration God has testified that its inception was not rooted in Him, but in ourselves." It is a peculiarity of piety that it ascribes the issue of all the affairs of life to God. "Was it right or not, that I (namely, Elimelech and she) went away to Moab?" Men might be in doubt about it. But the end, she says, bears witness against us, who followed our own inclinations. God testified against her, for "Shaddai hath afflicted me." In other words, in that God, as Shaddai, made sorrow my portion, He testified against me. The two clauses, יָעִקָּה בִּי

וְשָׁדַי הִרְעִילֵנִי, are not so much parallel as mutually explanatory. In the loss of my children and family, says Naomi, I perceive that He "declares me guilty," as the Targum also excellently renders יָעִקָּה בִּי. At the same time, the meaning of Shaddai comes here again clearly to view. For it is He who inflicts sorrow upon her, only in that her children are taken from her. That which God, as Shaddai, the giver of fruitfulness, did to her when he caused her sons to wither away, proves that God testifies against her. הִרְעִיל is here used just as it is in Josh. xxiv. 20:

1 [And, therefore, hardly to be called a "reading." That the LXX. read יָעִקָּה, as some have thought, is hardly possible, as that word could not be suitably construed with שָׁדַי. For the same reason Bertheau takes יָעִקָּה in the sense "to bestow labor on anything," cf. Eccles. i. 12.]

This general idea, he thinks, is then determined by what follows, so as to mean: "Jehovah has worked against me."

On יָעִקָּה בִּי, in the sense, to testify against, cf. Ex. xx 16; 2 Sam. i. 16; Is. iii. 9; etc. Bertheau's objection seems to be sufficiently met above.—Ta.]

"If ye forsake Jehovah—he will do you hurt (חִרְשׁ לָכֶם) and utterly destroy you."

Ver. 22. So Naomi returned and Ruth with her. The curiosity of the inhabitants of Bethlehem is satisfied; they have also heard the history of Ruth; but with this their sympathy has likewise come to an end. Naomi was poor and God-forsaken,—at least according to the pious and penitential feeling of the good woman herself. How natural, that in her native place, too, she should stand alone. But Ruth was with her. She had continued firm on the road, and she remained faithful in Bethlehem. Since there also no one assisted her mother-in-law, she continued to be her only stay and the sole sharer of her lot. Her presence is once more expressly indicated: "and Ruth, the Moabitess, with her, on her departure from the fields of Moab." No one was with her but Ruth, — who made the journey from Moab with her, in order to take care of her mother-in-law. What had become of Naomi, if Ruth, like Orpah, had forsaken her! She had sunk into poverty and humiliation more bitter than death. It is true, she too, with her husband, had left Israel in times of distress. But for this she could not be held responsible, although her generous spirit accused herself and no one else. On the other hand, she had been sufficiently punished, and had confessed her guilt. But in Bethlehem poor Naomi was made to feel that she now bore the name of Mara. Only Ruth had respect to neither before nor after. She reflected on neither happy nor sorrowful days. As she had loved in prosperity, so she remained true in adversity. Naomi, in her native place and among kindred, in Israel, had been alone and in want, had not the stranger, the widow of her son, accompanied her from her distant land. While such love was hers, Naomi was not yet wholly miserable; for God has respect to such fidelity.

And they came to Bethlehem in the beginning of barley-harvest. Consequently, in the beginning of the harvest season in general. This statement is made in order to intimate that the help of God did not tarry long. The harvest itself afforded the opportunity to prepare consolation and reward for both women in their highest need.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

"Call me not Naomi, but Mara." Naomi does not conceal her condition when she reaches her native place. Usually, the natural man, even as a beggar, still desires to shine. She has lost everything; and what she had gained, the companionship of Ruth, is not yet able to console her. Her very love fills her with anxiety for this daughter. Recollections are very bitter, and the future is full of care. It is, however, only because she is empty of all joys, that she wishes to be called Mara. But it was made evident even in her misery that whatever she had lost, she had found the grace of God; for then too she was not only named, but truly was; Naomi. Nor will one who in sorrow does not cease to be lovely, retain the name of Mara. Pope Gregory the Great, when praised (by Leander) replied: "Call me not Naomi, i. e. beautiful, but call me Mara, since I am full of bitter grief. For I am no more the same person you knew: outwardly I have advanced, inwardly I have fallen. And I fear to be among those of whom it is said: Thou castedst them down when they were lifted up. For when one is lifted up, he is cast down; he advances in honors and falls in morals."

THOMAS A KEMPIS: "It is good at times to be in distress; for it reminds us that we are in exile."

BENGEL: "If God have loved thee, thou canst have had no lack of trouble."

"For Shaddai hath afflicted me." Naomi did not go to Moab of her own accord, for she followed her husband. Her stay also in the strange land was prolonged only because her sons had married there. After their death, although poor and empty, she returned home again, albeit she had but little to hope for. And yet in the judgment she perceives only her own guilt. Her loving heart takes all God's judgments on itself. The more she loved, the more ready she was to repent. Being a Naomi, she did not accuse those she loved. The sign of true love is unselfishness, which ascribes ills to self, blessings to others. As long as she was in misery, she took the anger of God upon herself; but as soon as she perceived the favor of God, she praised Him as the God who showed kindness to the living and the dead.

[FULLER: "And all the city was moved," etc. See here, Naomi was formerly a woman of good quality and fashion, of good rank and repute: otherwise her return in poverty had not been so generally taken notice of. Shrubs may be grubbed to the ground, and none miss them; but every one marks the felling of a cedar. Grovelling cottages may be evened to the earth, and none observe them; but every traveller takes notice of the fall of a steeple. Let this comfort those to whom God hath given small possessions. Should He visit them with poverty, and take from them that little they have, yet their grief and shame would be the less: they should not have so many fingers pointed at them, so many eyes staring on them, so many words spoken of them; they might lurk in obscurity: it must be a Naomi, a person of eminency and estate, whose poverty must move a whole city.—THE SAME: "Seeing the Lord hath testified against me, and the Almighty hath afflicted me." Who then is able to hold out suit with God in the court of heaven? For God himself is both judge and witness, and also the executor and inflicter of punishments.

BP. HALL: Ten years have turned Naomi into Mara. What assurance is there of these earthly things whereof one hour may strip us? What man can say of the years to come, thus will I be? — Tr.]

CHAPTER SECOND.

VERSE 1.

The Relative.

- 1 AND Naomi had [in Bethlehem] a kinsman [lit. acquaintance,] of her husband's, a mighty man of wealth [a valiant hero], of the family of Elimelech; and his name was Boaz.

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Before relating the wonderful deliverance through a kinsman, by which faithfulness and love are rewarded, the writer first informs us briefly of the existence of the person who is chosen to effect this deliverance. Hitherto the acting persons have been only women, both of them loving and excellent; now, the portrait of a man is drawn, who is the model of an Israelite, as family-head and as land-lord, in war and in peace.

Naomi had a kinsman. The expression for this is מִיָּדָע. In our texts, it is true, it is pointed מִיָּדָע, with מוֹדָע, as Keri, in the margin. But מִיָּדָע occurs only once more (Prov. vii. 4), and there also we must probably read מִיָּדָע. The reading מִיָּדָע was preferred by the Masora only on account of the fem. מוֹדָעַת, which occurs at ch. iii. 2. The participle מִיָּדָע is of more frequent occurrence, cf. Ps. lv. 14. Hitherto, Naomi could say, as does the Psalmist (lxxxviii. 9): "Thou hast put my kinsmen (מִיָּדָעַי) far from me." Compare also ver. 19 of the same psalm, where it stands in parallelism with מוֹדָע, lover, and רֵעַ, companion. She has likewise experienced what is written Ps. xxxi. 12, cf. Job xix. 14. Literally, to be sure, the word means only an "acquaintance;" but it expresses more than we mean by that term. The man was not a very near relative, but one "known" to the family, as belonging to it. It was an acquaintance valid within the family lines; hence the word signifies as much as familiaris. It is used in a noteworthy connection at 2 Kgs. x. 11, where Jehu slays all the great men, the מִיָּדָעִים, and the priests of Ahab, — i. e. everybody that adhered to him, whether from family connection or interest. The Latin notus may occasionally approximate to the idea of the Hebrew term even more closely than the Greek γινώσκω; not so much, however, in Catull. lxxix. 4 (si tria notorum basia reperit), as in Liv. iii. 44, where, with reference to the violence done to Virginia, is said: notos gratia (patris et sponsi) turbam indignitas rei virgini conriliat.

The fact is emphasized that Boaz was only a מִיָּדָע. This not only explains a certain remoteness of Naomi from him, but it makes the piety, which notwithstanding the distance (manifest also from ch. iii. 12) of the relationship, performs what the narrative goes on to relate, more conspicuously great than it would appear if, according to an unfounded conjecture of Jewish expositors, he were held to be the son of Elimelech's brother.

A valiant hero. These words are applied to Boaz in no other sense than to Gideon (Judg. vi. 12), Jephthah (xi. 1), and others, and have no reference to his wealth and property. He was a strong and able man in Israel, in war and in peace. Probably he had distinguished himself in conflicts of Israel against enemies, perhaps against Moab. The ancestor of David is, as the Midrash (Ruth 31, d) remarks, rightly thus described. His name, Boaz (בּוֹאֵז), is to be explained by reference to the name of one of the pillars erected by Solomon, and called Boaz, while the other was named Jachin (cf. my Gold. Thron Salomo's, p. 45). It is not a compound of בּוֹאֵז, but a contraction of בּוֹאֵז וְיָצִי, "son of strength, of enduring vigor." The signification alacritas (Ges., Keil, etc.), would hardly be applicable to the pillar.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

The same characteristic is ascribed to Boaz as to Gideon, and to David. But concerning his warlike deeds nothing is related. In Israel, however, there was no valor, properly so called, except such as sprang from the acknowledgment of the living God. The word is not applied to wild battle-rage, but to moral strength, which valiantly repels distress and dishonor, as Abraham drew the sword for his country against foreign oppressors. Boaz was a hero in war through his virtue in peace. And this virtue comes so clearly to view in the Book of Ruth, that the narrator could justly add: he was a brave man. For morally brave he shows himself in every relation: 1. as landlord; 2. as confessor of God; 3. as man of action; and hence he receives the reward both of him who dispenses blessings and of him who receives them.

[FULLER: "This first verse presents us with two remarkable things: 1. Poor Naomi was allied to powerful Boaz. 2. Boaz was both a powerful man and a godly man." — Tr.]

VERSES 2-17.

The Reward of Faithfulness begins.

- 2 And Ruth the Moabitess said unto Naomi, Let me now go to the field, and glean ears of corn<sup>1</sup> after him in whose sight I shall find grace. And she said unto her,
 3 Go, my daughter. And she went, and came, and gleaned in the field after the reapers: and her hap was to light on a [the] part of the field<sup>2</sup> belonging unto Boaz,
 4 who was of the kindred [family] of Elimelech. And behold, Boaz came from Bethlehem, and said unto the reapers, The Lord [Jehovah] be with you: and they
 5 answered him, The Lord [Jehovah] bless thee. Then said Boaz [And Boaz said] unto his servant that was set over the reapers, Whose damsel is this? And the 6 servant that was set over the reapers answered and said, It is the<sup>3</sup> Moabitish damsel that came back with Naomi out of the country [territories] of Moab: And she said, I pray you [thee], let me glean and [I will] gather after the reapers among the sheaves: so she came, and hath continued even from the morning until now,
 8 that<sup>4</sup> she tarried a little in the house. Then said Boaz [And Boaz said] unto Ruth, Hearst thou not, my daughter? Go not to glean in another field, neither go from 9 hence, but abide here fast by my maidens: Let thine eyes be on the field that they do reap, and go thou [fearlessly] after them: have I not charged the young men that they shall not touch [molest] thee? and when thou art athirst,<sup>5</sup> go unto the vessels, and drink of that which the young men have drawn. Then she fell on her face, and bowed herself to the ground, and said unto him, Why have I found grace in thine eyes, that thou shouldest take knowledge [friendly notice] of me, seeing I am a stranger?
 11 And Boaz answered and said unto her, It hath fully been shewed me, all that thou hast done unto thy mother-in law since the death of thine husband: and how thou hast left thy father and thy mother, and the land of thy nativity, and art come
 12 unto a people which thou knewest not heretofore. The Lord [Jehovah] recompense thy work, and a full [complete] reward be given thee of the Lord [Jehovah]
 13 God of Israel, under whose wings thou art come to trust [seek refuge]. Then she said, Let me find favour<sup>6</sup> in thy sight, my lord; for that thou hast comforted me, and for that thou hast spoken friendly unto [to the heart of] thine handmaid, though
 14 I be not like unto one of thy handmaidens. And Boaz said unto her, At meal-time<sup>7</sup> come thou hither, and eat of the bread, and dip thy morsel in the vinegar. And she sat beside the reapers: and he reached her parched corn, and she did eat, and was 15 sufficed [satisfied], and left [over]. And when she was risen up to glean, Boaz commanded his young men, saying, Let her glean even among [between] the sheaves, and reproach her not: And let fall [pull out]<sup>8</sup> also some of [from] the handfulls [bundles] of purpose for her, and leave them [it], that she may glean them [it], and 17 rebuke her not. So she gleaned in the field until even, and beat out that she had gleaned: and it was about an ephah of barley.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 2. — וְרֹחַל גִּלְתָּה בְּעֶמְלֵךְ: lit. "and glean, among the ears." The construction is exactly parallel to that in ver. 7; i. e. גִּלְתָּה is used absolutely, without an accus., as frequently in our Book and elsewhere. The idea is, Let me gather (sc. some ears) among those that are left lying in the field by the harvesters. — Tr.]

[2 Ver. 3. — חֵלקָהּ הַשָּׂדֶה: "the field-portion," i. e. that part of the grain-fields about Bethlehem that belonged to Boaz. "Though gardens and vineyards are usually surrounded by a stone wall or hedge of prickly pear, the grain fields, on the contrary, though they belong to different proprietors, are not separated by any inclosure from each other. The boundary between them is indicated by heaps of small stones, or sometimes by single upright stones placed at intervals of a rod or more from each other" (Hackett, Illustr. of Scripture, p. 167). In בְּהֶהָרַח הָיָה, lit. "her hap happened," מְהֶרָה is the subject of הָיָה, cf. Eccles. ii. 14. חֵלקָהּ הַשָּׂדֶה is the accus. of place, cf. Gen. ii. 18, 1. — Tr.]

[3 Ver. 6. — Or: "She is a Moabitish maiden, who came back with Naomi from," etc. This supposes that מְהֶרָה is, as the accentuation makes it, and against which nothing is to be said here, the third fem. perfect, cf. the note on ch. i. 22. Thus taken, the answer does not assume that Boaz is acquainted with the return of Naomi. The E. V. may, however, be justified by taking מְהֶרָה as a participle, cf. Gen. ii. 2, a. — Tr.]

[4 Ver. 7. — וְיָיִן is joined by Dr. Cassel to וְיָיִן, as adv. of time (so also Gesenius and Fürst, cf. Lexica, s. v.): "and until now her resting (cf. below) in the house was little." But this unnecessarily disturbs the accentuation. Better translate: "this her sitting in the house (וְיָיִן, accus. of place) is but for a little" (וְיָיִן, adv. or accus. of time). וְיָיִן is an Aramæizing of the more regular Hebrew וְיָיִן, cf. Ew. 238, b, and the Lexica, s. v. וְיָיִן. — On וְיָיִן, in the preceding clause, see Ges. 126, 6. Ruth says: Pray, permit me to glean, and and (in consequence of this permission) I will gather, etc. — Ta.]

[5 Ver. 9. — וְיָיִן, from וְיָיִן, but inflected as if from a form וְיָיִן, cf. Ges. 75, Rem. 21, c. On the use of the word as perfect, cf. on ch. i. 12. On the perfects וְיָיִן and וְיָיִן, Ges. 126, Rem. 1; and on the imperfect וְיָיִן, Ges. 127, 4, b. וְיָיִן is rendered "out of which" by Bertheau and Keil (because water-drawing was ordinarily done by women?); but in that case the more natural position of וְיָיִן would be after וְיָיִן, thus: and out of what the young men draw (drink), drink thou (too). — Ta.]

[6 Ver. 12. — וְיָיִן: optative. "To take it as present indicat.: I find favor, as is done by Le Clerc and Bertheau, is not in accordance with the modesty of humility which Ruth manifests in the following words" (Keil). Nor is the word expressive of a permanent state or condition, which would justify the imperfect indicative, as is the case with the וְיָיִן of the next clause, cf. Ges. 127, 2. — Ta.]

[7 Ver. 14. — According to the accentuation of the Masorites, these words belong to the preceding clause: "And Boaz said to her at the time of eating, Come hither," etc. וְיָיִן, from וְיָיִן, an anomalous form for וְיָיִן, as וְיָיִן for וְיָיִן, Josh. iii. 9; 1 Sam. xiv. 38. The second accent, merca, is here, as in other instances (Gen. xxviii. 2; Num. xvii. 23, etc.) used instead of metheg. — לְיָיִן without mappik as in Num. xxiii. 42; Zech. v. 11. — Ta.]

[8 Ver. 16. — וְיָיִן. The use of וְיָיִן in the sense "to draw out" is only a return to the original meaning of the word. It is the same word as συνάγω, which also originally meant to draw out, for it was from the drawing off or stripping of their armor from the slain that it obtained the signification "to make booty, to plunder." [On the use of the infin. const. for the absol. see Ges. 121, 4, Rem. 2. — Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Ver. 2. And Ruth, the Moabitess, said to Naomi. Naomi was manifestly in need. No one seemed to help her, nor had she the heart to ask. It is but too clear now that her lot would have been a dismal one, if at her return Ruth had not faithfully clung to her. But this young woman's fidelity shows itself now also. As the barley-harvest is in progress, she offers to go to the field and ask for permission to glean. It was no easy offer. Ruth was probably ignorant of those provisions of the Israelitish law according to which the gleanings of the harvest-field and even a forgotten sheaf were to be left to the poor and the stranger, the widow and the orphan (cf. Lev. xxiii. 22; Deut. xxiv. 19). At least, she did not seem to expect the observance of such a custom; for she hoped to obtain permission to glean from the possible kindness of some proprietor. But at best, what a miserable task for the once happy and prosperous widow! Possibly to see herself treated as a beggar, harshly addressed or even personally maltreated by rude reapers! To pass the day in heat and distress, in order at evening, hungry and weary, to bring home a little barley! For this then she had left paternal house and land, in order in deepest misery to be perchance yet also abused as a foreigner! But the love she cherishes, makes everything easy to her. It not only gives utterance to good words, but it carries them into practice. She forgets everything, in order now to remember her filial duty to Naomi. And Naomi accepts her offer.

Go, my daughter. Until now, she has only silently endured every expression of Ruth's self-sacrifice. She had indeed ceased to dissuade her from going with her, but she had also refrained from encouraging her. Ruth might even now, after having reached Bethlehem, experienced the poverty of her mother-in-law, and tasted the sense of strangeness in Israel, have returned to Moab. But the meekness with which, instead of this, she asks permission to encounter toil and misery for her, overcomes in Naomi too every ulterior consideration. Such a request could no longer be silently accepted; nor could it be refused. Naomi permits her to glean in the harvest-field. Nor was it an easy thing for the mother to give this consent. The remarkable characters of both women come here also nobly to view. Ruth, who has given up everything, is humble as a dutiful child, and asks for permission to give up more. Naomi, who in her highest need would accept nothing from Ruth, in order not to involve her in the same distress, — who retains her maternal authority in circumstances of want in which people generally would deem this impossible, — has no other reward for Ruth's self-sacrificing disposition than that she is ready to accept its efforts for herself.

Ver. 3. And she lighted providentially on the field of Boaz. More literally: "And her lot met her on the field of Boaz." (וְיָיִן, fut. apoc.

from וְיָיִן, וְיָיִן, occurrere.) Ruth, as a stranger in Bethlehem, knew neither persons nor properties. She might have chanced on fields of strange and unfriendly owners. Providence so ordered it, that without knowing it, she entered the field of one who was of the family of Elimelech, and therefore also a distant relative of her deceased husband.

Ver. 4 ff. And behold Boaz came from Bethlehem. A finer picture of rural harvest-scenes is nowhere extant. We hear, as it were, the rustling of the reapers' sickles.<sup>1</sup> Behind them are the women, binding the cut grain (ver. 8). The overseer's presence promotes industry and order (ver. 5). In case of thirst, there stand the water-vessels at no great distance. The fields surround the country-house with its various outbuildings, where the weary may find a moment's rest and refreshment.

At meal-time, the laborers are supplied (as at the present day, cf. Rob. ii. 50), with roasted grain<sup>1</sup> and bread.<sup>2</sup> The latter they dip in a refreshing drink, consisting of vinegar and water, with perhaps some oil mixed in it.<sup>3</sup>

But rural life has not in itself that paradisaic happiness which Virgil contrasts so enthusiastically with the luxuriant and slavish life of Rome. It may perhaps be true that a country population is more patient of labor and more readily contented with small means ("patiens operum exiguoque adueta iuventus," — Georg. ii. 472); but it is only when a pious and godfearing spirit rules in the hearts of proprietor and dependents that it is good to live amid the quiet scenes and rewardful toil of the country. Only then, too, is the poet's word applicable: "the chaste dwelling preserves virtue" (casta pudicitiam servat domus).

An example of such a country life meets us here in the good times of Israel. Boaz himself, when the day has considerably advanced, comes to look after his people in the field. His greeting is, "Jehovah be with you!" Their answer, "Jehovah bless thee!" Nor is this, in his mouth, merely a customary form: the reality of his piety is manifest from his life and works. Hence, also, as the master, so the servant. The overseer knows the benignity of his master, and imitates it. This appears as soon as Boaz comes and notices the strange maiden. That he does this at once, is only a new feature in the rural picture. On the fields of Boaz, the poor were not hindered in their legal privilege of gleanings. But the proprietor knows not only his work-people, but the needy also. Ruth he had never yet seen. It may be supposed also that her modest and reserved bearing served at once to mark her. She who had so long been mistress herself, had not the look of those who have grown bold in beggary. Such a one as she was must have sufficiently manifested her superiority over the female servants by the natural charm and grace of her presence, even though she dressed in the same style and engaged in similar toil. She could not fail to surprise Boaz, as he surveyed his people and their labor. He turns to his overseer with the natural inquiry, "Whose is this damsel?" It was in accordance with national custom to ask, not, "Who is this damsel?" — for that was of comparatively little importance, — but, "Whence is she? how comes she here? to what estate does she belong? With the overseer's answer begins the beautiful delineation of the two principal persons of the narrative in their first meeting. The overseer knew Ruth; and it was not necessary to tell Boaz much about her, since the return of Naomi had been much talked of. But it is honorable to him that he at once recommends her by praising her diligence. Since morning she had not ceased to glean, — had scarcely rested a little in the house.<sup>4</sup> This praise of her diligence included praise of the propriety and reserve of her demeanor. She was very unlike other gleaners. Those were apt to chatter and do many other things beside that for which they came.

Ver. 8. And Boaz said to Ruth, Go not to glean in another field. The interest of Boaz, who had already heard of the Moabitess, especially as Naomi was at least something more to him than an entire stranger, — a fact either unknown to the overseer, or which, like a good and sagacious servant, he discreetly passed over, — could not but increase by reason of the praise bestowed on Ruth. He therefore went to her, to speak with her personally. In the case of another maiden of whom he had heard similar good reports, he would have given a few favorable directions concerning her to his overseer. But here he was met by various peculiar considerations. Was it Naomi, the widow of a relative of his, who was forced to lay claim to the widow's rights in the harvest-fields of Israel, or was it the Moabitess, who, for having attached herself with all her heart to Israel, now commanded the favor of the Israelite? Both these thoughts are at work in the noble mind of Boaz. He recognizes the existence of a certain relationship, the benefit of which is due to Ruth. It is not a common maid-servant who stands before him. Had he been actuated by the spirit of modern sentimentality, he would probably have been ashamed of her. He would have offered her a piece of money, and sent her away, that it might not become known that this Moabitish beggar is his relative! He would at all events not have allowed her to go on gleanings! But according to the ancient delicate and religious view, he cannot act thus. Nothing has been asked of him; consequently, he has no right to wound the self-respect of others. The privilege of gleanings belongs of right to the widow and the stranger. It is not well that she needs it; but needing it, he cannot hinder her from using it. Even while he admits her relationship, he can only support her in this right, and enlarge its advantages. And this is what he does. Ruth had modestly gleaned at a distance from the reapers and binders.<sup>5</sup> He calls her nearer, and says: "Go not to glean in another field." In

<sup>1</sup> [The following remarks on parched corn are from Dr. Thomson's The Land and the Book (ii. 510): "It is made thus: a quantity of the best ears, not too ripe, are plucked with the stalks attached. These are tied into small parcels, a blazing fire is kindled with dry grass and thorn bushes, and the corn-heads are held in it until the chaff is mostly burned off. The grain is thus sufficiently roasted to be eaten, and it is a favorite article all over the country. When travelling in harvest-time, my muleteers have very often thus prepared parched corn in the evenings after the tent has been pitched. Nor is the gathering of these green ears for parching ever regarded as stealing. After it has been roasted, it is rubbed out in the hand and eaten as there is occasion." — TA.]

<sup>3</sup> In describing his servitude in Egypt, M. Heberer says (Roemmüller, Morgenland, iii. 68): "It is truly incredible how the biscuit, eaten with vinegar and oil, strengthens the weary and exhausted system and restores its powers." The drink of the Roman soldiers, called pasca, consisted of water and vinegar. Hadrian, to encourage his troops, used it himself (Spartan. Vit. Hist. ch. x). Of a different nature is the food which in Virgil (Ecl. ii. 10) is prepared for the reapers (rapido ferris messoribus astus) and others, with garlic and thyme. Some other learned observations see in Serarius, Quaest. xxiv. p. 738.

<sup>4</sup> שְׁכַנְתָּהּ הַיָּמִית. The allusion can only be to a field-building, since otherwise her sitting in it could not be known to the laborers. And as the "sitting" forms a contrast with her laboring, it must be taken in the sense of "resting." In the Sept. rendering ἐν ἀγρῷ, ἀγρός stands for a building in the field, villa, castra in agro.

<sup>5</sup> There is a difference when, according to ver. 7, she gleaned near the sheaves, after the reapers, אֶחָרֵי הַקְּצִירִים, and when, in ver. 15, she is allowed to glean "between the sheaves," בֵּין הַקְּצִירִים, among the reapers these words he acknowledges the first degree of the interest to which his relationship binds him. Both for her sake—for would she everywhere have such favorable opportunities to glean as he gave her?—and also for his own! That which is a benefit to her, is also seemly with respect to himself as related to her, in order that Elimelech's daughter-in-law may not wander from field to field like one utterly helpless.

Not go from hence, but keep here, with my maidens. He has called her to him where he stands, near the reapers. Only on this supposition are these words intelligible. Immediately behind the reapers, came the maidens who bound the grain. The gleaner who was allowed to approach nearest the latter, had the best opportunity. Ruth had hitherto kept back, which perhaps allowed others to anticipate her and take away the best. Boaz bids her come close up to the binders, and to stay there.<sup>1</sup> He allows her to glean indeed, but he makes her gleaning more productive.

Ver. 9. Keep thine eyes on the field that they reap, and go after them, etc. He takes care not only to provide her an abundant gleanings, but also to ensure the safety of her person. He is not dealing with a gleaner of the common class. Close by the reapers is no doubt a good place for finding ears, but it involves also the possibility of rude treatment. Her appearance may have been such as would not unlikely provoke the coarse jests with which such peasant laborers were perhaps in the habit of assailing women. She would prefer, therefore, as he foresees, to keep herself back, rather than work in their immediate neighborhood. Be not concerned, he says: I have already given charge that no one touch thee.<sup>2</sup> Act without fear; and when thou thirstest, go boldly and drink.

Ver. 10. Then she fell on her face, etc. It may be clearly seen here, that only such as can exercise love, understand how to receive it. No one is humbler than he who truly gives from love—of that Ruth is a proof; and for that reason, humility never shows itself more beautiful, than when love receives. Ruth had made the greatest sacrifices, although no one had a right to expect them from her, and is withal so unassuming, as not to look for anything from others. Most people in her place would have made the first favor shown them, the occasion for saying that in truth they were not at all used to such work. Their thanks would have been combined with complaints and accusing insinuations about the distress in which they found themselves, although they had exchanged the people and God of Moab for those of Israel. Ruth's love did not spring from selfishness, and hence did not give birth to any proud self-consciousness. Instead of a sigh that she who had said, "thy people is my people, thy God my God," could scarcely by weary toil procure sustenance in Israel, she utters her humble thanks to Boaz: How is it that I, a stranger, obtain such favor!

<sup>1</sup> The words לֹא תִּעְזְבִּי מִן הַשָּׂדֶה [on the form תִּעְזְבִּי, cf. Gen. 47, Rem. 1] would be a useless repetition, if they did not express the idea that she is not to leave the place where she now stands before him (and whither he probably caused her to be called), as being favorable to her success.

Instead of taking it as a matter of course that Boaz should especially regard (הִנָּחִיר) her, being a stranger, she is so unassuming as to deem this very fact an enhancement of his kindness.

Ver. 11. And Boaz said, It hath been told me, etc. The answer which Boaz gives, is not simply that of the landed proprietor, but of the Israelite. He speaks out of the abundance of the faith of Israel. We feel that he acts as he does from a sense of his duty as an Israelite. The Jewish expositors have identified Boaz with Iban the judge (Judg. xii. 8), because the latter also was of Bethlehem—manifestly the northern Bethlehem, however, and not that of Judah (cf. the Comment. on Judges). But in enunciating such opinions, they have their eyes more on the spirit than on the historical facts. They only felt themselves bound to point out that, since Boaz, like other Judges, is said to have been a "valiant hero," and is evidently rich and highly esteemed, he must also have exercised the functions of the judge. Literally, this cannot be maintained; for, had it been the case, our Book would not have been silent on the subject. But during the so-called period of the Judges, there were certainly other able men in Israel than the heroes mentioned in the Book of Judges, who filled the office of judge in their cities (cf. Com. on Judg. ii. 16); and Boaz would certainly furnish us with a beautiful likeness of one of these. In his words, at least, there is undeniably the breathing of a pious, national consciousness, such as becomes an Israelitish family-head and hero in the presence of a recent proselyte to his faith and people.

All that thou hast done unto thy mother-in-law, etc. The words of Boaz here clearly state what, in accordance with the delicacy of ancient narration, was not expressly said above. Ruth has nowhere hinted that she was showing kindness to her mother-in-law in going with her to Israel. All she said, was, "I will not leave thee." When Naomi arrives at Bethlehem, and everybody is eager with curiosity, the lamentations in which she breaks out are indeed recorded, but not the words in which she praised her daughter-in-law. Nevertheless, she fully appreciated what Ruth did for her. This was the very reason why she at first refused to accept her sacrifice. Afterwards, however, she gratefully recounted her obligations to her daughter-in-law, but, as discreet minds are wont to do, behind her back. Boaz could have derived his knowledge only from narrations proceeding from Naomi herself.

The merit which Boaz imputes to Ruth is of a twofold nature. Induced by affection, she has left the highest possessions of life. She was no orphan, she was not homeless; she had what she needed, but left all, and that for something unknown, the value of which she was not able to estimate. "Thou camest," he says, "to a people which yesterday<sup>3</sup> and the day before yesterday (i. e.

In the Hiph. נִכְרִי, and the adject. form נִכְרִי, the two offshoots of the radical signification appear in juxtaposition to each other, as in the German unterscheiden (to distinguish) and ausscheiden (to separate).

<sup>4</sup> אֶתְמוּל is an abbreviation of אֶתְמוּלִּית. The explanation becomes clearer by comparison with other languages. The Greek ἄστριον (astērion), the Latin acri (Asterius), and the German gestern (Goth. gistra), may all be recognized formerly) thou didst not know." How? had she not known her family, Naomi, and her own husband, who were of Israel? But this family lived in Moab, where Israel's law was not in force. The national usages and institutions which had been impressed upon Israel by Israel's God, she did not know. And notwithstanding this, she had said, "Thy people is my people, thy God my God."

Ver. 12. Jehovah recompense thy work. As Boaz praises a double merit in Ruth, so he gives a double form to his wish for her. First he says, generally, "Jehovah recompense thy work." Independently of Naomi's connection with Israel, Ruth's love for her mother-in-law, for whose sake she has left parents and native land, deserves the reward of God. But she came to Israel with Naomi, and for her sake has trustfully connected herself with a people whose laws she did not know, and whose character she has only seen mirrored forth in her husband and his mother. For this love and trust may Jehovah, the God of Israel, as he expressly adds, reward thee! Jehovah is known in Israel. Whoever accepts him, may build on Him. He covers with his wings, him who confides in Him and sets his hopes on Him (Ps. xci. 1 ff.), Ruth has come trustfully expecting to be able to live in Israel with Naomi. She has brought nothing with her; has left everything. They have come, both poor; and have scarcely what is necessary to sustain life. Nevertheless, for her love's sake, she dared to make the God of Israel her God. Like Abraham, leaving all, she went abroad. And as to Abraham God said, "I am thy great reward" (Gen. xv. 1), so Boaz wishes that God may be to her a full reward. A "full reward," abundant as her love, so that she shall miss nothing, but recover all; and so that in her it may be seen, how those are entertained who shelter themselves beneath His wings. Boaz does not discourse as one would speak to a Moabitish beggar. Having heard who she is, he looks upon her with eyes full of joy over her pious actions. He speaks to her as a priest and prophet. And since he spoke from the enthusiasm of piety, and she was deserving, his words found fulfillment. She received a reward which was not only full, but which completed and wholly filled her, all of which is implied in the words יְשַׁלֵּם and יְשַׁלְּמָהּ.

Ver. 13 ff. May I find favor in thy sight; for thou hast comforted me. The impression of the words of Boaz must have been very grateful to the humble mind of Ruth. It was the first sunbeam that broke through the grief and tears of many weeks. Hitherto, she had tasted only parting sorrow. She had suffered at the grave of her husband, suffered on the way from the land which held the dwelling of her parents, and her sufferings were not yet at an end when she reached Israel. There she had hitherto suffered from the sense of loneliness. Everybody talked of her as the "Moabitess." She was poor to beggary. Now, for the first time, she is addressed about the God of Israel and his grace, and hears the voice of blessing from one of that people with members of which she has endured so much. The full import of his words her humble heart does not presume to appropriate. But the kindness and benevolence of the speaker's voice, is for her like the sound of a bubbling spring in the desert to the thirsty. I have long been sad, she intends to say; thou hast comforted me. I look for no reward; but thou hast spoken to the heart of thy servant, that was full of grief and anguish. Her phraseology also indicates her sincere humility. "May I find favor in thy sight," she says, by way of humble introduction to her grateful acknowledgment of the comfort he has imparted to her. It is a formula expressive of the reverence she feels for Boaz. She invokes his favor, that she may tell him how his words have refreshed her. Whoever has, like her, left everything, in order to live in Israel, will feel that the highest and best utterance she could make, when for the first time she tasted the kindness of Israel, was gratitude for the comfort experienced. A word of love comes on a loving heart like hers, long afflicted by sorrow, like morning dews on a thirsty field.

And yet I am not as one of thy handmaidens.<sup>1</sup> No one can speak so well and beautifully as an unassuming person. Ruth manifests no consciousness of having done anything special. Boaz she thinks is doubtless equally kind and good to all his people. So much the more is it her part to be grateful that he has also been kind to her, who does not, as they, belong to his household, nor even to his people. It might be thought strange that Boaz says nothing to her of his relationship to her husband. But if he thought of it, he purposely kept silent about it. He showed her kindness, not because she was distantly related to him, but solely because of her excellence. In the case of one like Ruth, he needed not the remembrance of kinship to stir him up to take interest in her. It was not as the widow of his kinsman that he distinguished her with special favor, but as one who had taken refuge under the wings of Israel's God. Ruth likewise did not know what Boaz was to her husband's family; nor had she wasted a word to make him aware that she had ever been more than a maid-servant, which, had she done, might have brought their relationship to speech.

The answer of Ruth raised her still higher in the esteem of Boaz. He is not satisfied with the provisions already made in her behalf. He bids her join in the common meal, and helps her to a portion of everything on hand. Nor is he satisfied to let her have merely a common gleaning. He orders that now and then some ears be intentionally drawn out of the "bundles" and left for her to gather up. This last injunction he gives to the workmen themselves, not merely to the overseer.

It is interesting also to notice the different expressions in which he forbids any rude treatment of Ruth by the workpeople. Above, in ver. 9, he told them not to "touch" her. In ver. 15, where she receives permission also to glean between the sheaves, he tells them not to "shame" her, in other words, to say things to her that would make her blush, whether they referred to her nationality or to the special favor by which she was directed to glean close behind the reapers. In ver. 16, finally, having ordered the people even to pull ears out of the bundles for her, he charges them not to "speak harshly" to her (לִפְנֵי), or to scold her, on account of the extra trouble which this order might occa-

in the Sanskrit ājas (Benf. II. 208). Jas (in ājas) is, "the day," and the ā is the demonstrative article pointing backward, cf. Lat. ille; so that ājas, and the other cognate forms, signify, "that day," i. e. "the former day." The formation of אֶתְמָחָר is analogous. מָחָר (מָחָר) is equivalent sion them. It is necessary to distinguish carefully between לֶמֶךְ and לֶבֶן. The former is the sheaf, already bound by the maid-servants, and lying on the ground; the latter,<sup>1</sup> is the bundle as "taken up," and still held in the arm, manipulus.

Amid all the unusual favors bestowed on her, Ruth does not cease for a moment to be herself. Boaz reached or caused to be reached to her an abundance of roasted ears. She eats and is satisfied — this is stated in order to indicate the abundant supply; the remainder she carefully takes up to carry home. She never thinks only of herself. After the meal, — at which it is appropriate<sup>2</sup> to suppose Boaz to be present, — gleaning is an easier task than before his coming; she finds ears in plenty, but not on that account does she cease the sooner. She gleaned till evening, takes the pains, too, to beat out what she has gathered, and carries home a plentiful harvest, almost an ephah. It is impossible to ascertain the quantity, still less its weight, exactly, but it was considerable, say fifty-five pounds.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

"Let me go to the field and glean ears of corn."

Ruth manifested her confession of the God of Israel not merely by words: she testifies her love also by deeds. She is inclined to work for Naomi as well as to live with her. She not only learned to pray to God with her, but she will also beg for her among men. Accordingly, Naomi, in her poverty, is not maintained by the friends of her family, but by the love of her proselyte daughter-in-law. What Ruth had never done in Moab, — the hard service of begging at the hands of men, and of gleaning in the hot days of harvest-time in the midst of vulgar surroundings, — that she freely offers to do in Israel. As proselyte she felt herself compelled to what as heathen she had never had need of. Had a sister Moabitess met her in this employment, and inquired what it was that could urge her to it, she would have answered her as Elger von Hohenstein did his brother, who finding him, away from his castle and its life of ease, engaged in taking care of the poor, exclaimed, "Alas, my brother, what are you doing? what distress compels you to this?" "Sir brother mine," was the answer, "distress compels me not; but the love of Christ my Lord constrains me."

Here also Ruth is the great type of all true conversion in the history of the Christian Church. While Pharisees and priests were too dull to recognize the light of Christ, the apostles whom he had won to himself, constrained by love, labored for their nation, and were willing to be banished and to suffer, if only they might win some. While in Southern Europe, in the old cities of the Roman Empire, the love of Christians had become cold, the new-won proselytes from Celtic, Anglo-Saxon, and German heathendom went forth, and in the heat of conflict and suffering, gleaned rich harvests for their Lord in the North and East.

Enough has never been done in the way of seeking to win and train converts by the force of example and doctrine. Of example, indeed, they have often seen too much. Everything that has ever been done for them, and which is sometimes made matter of disguised boasting, is not equal to what a single proselyte, burning with love for the kingdom of his Lord, has suffered and accomplished.

STARKE: "To begin a good work is glorious; but to continue in it, notwithstanding all inducements to apostasy, is godly."

True love can never fail in its purpose, although success may tarry long. Ruth had been married ten years in Moab, before she could say, "Thy God is my God." But now only a few harvest-days elapsed, and the favor of God, exerting itself through a genuine Israelite, overspread her. Failure always has its ground in the spirit of the purpose. If that spirit be love rooted in God, as in Ruth, it will not be disappointed. Hence, the surest sign of love is gentle and thankful patience.

CHRYSOSTOM: "Observe that what happened to Ruth is analogous with what happened to us. For she was a stranger, and had fallen into the extremest distress; but Boaz, when he saw her, neither despised her poverty, nor contemned the lowliness of her family. So Christ took up the Church, and chose the stranger, who lacked the most necessary possessions, for his bride. But as Ruth would never have attained to such a union, had she not previously left her parents and given up people, home, and kindred, so the Church also does not become dear and deserving in the eyes of her Bridegroom, until she has left her ancestral (heathen) morals and customs."

"Boaz came from Bethlehem and said unto the reapers," etc. A true believer is also the best employer. He greets them, "Jehovah be with you!" They answer, "Jehovah bless thee!" Living faith in God is the best bond between master and workman, preventing a wrongful use of power on the one side, and presumptuous insubordination on the other. Not as if the servants of Boaz were free from the rude manners so generally characteristic of their class; but the just demeanor of their master, refined by humility, controlled them. Where a pious and brave spirit like that of Boaz pervades the community, social questions and crises do not arise. For external laws can never restrain the inward cravings of the natural man. But where the landed proprietor, in his relations to his people, is governed by other principles than those of self-interest, and cares also for their moral and religious development; where, further, the laborer understands that an increase in wages is not necessarily an increase of peace and happiness; where, in a word, the consciousness of an omnipresent God regulates the uprightness and care of the one, and the honesty and devotion of the other, there no artificial solutions of conflicts between capital and labor will be required. Boaz lives in God, and therefore knows what duties of faith and love are obligatory upon him.

STARKE: "If God be with work-people, and if they are reverently mindful of his omnipresence, they will be preserved from idleness and unfaithfulness, and restrained from all sorts of frivolous and from a root which means "to give," the other from one which means "to take." The first is cognate with the Arabic dhakatha, to take, to lay hold of with the hand, hence a "handful," manipulus (cf. II. xi. 69). The other is to be compared with the Greek δαν-δην, expense, "out-give," cf. δίδωμι, Sanskrit dadami, dare.

"Jehovah, the God of Israel, give thee a complete reward." Boaz finds that Ruth has come to glean on his field. He had not yet seen, but had heard of her. But now, seeing her diligence, but also her neediness, he yet does not speak to her as a rich man to one on whom he bestows an alms, nor as one relative to another, but, before all else, as an Israelite to one who has come to shelter herself under the wings of Israel's God. The Israelitish proprietor speaks like a priest of Jehovah. Before all his people, he blesses her in her confession of his God. He announces to her prophetically the reward of her love. And his word was fulfilled, for, as a church-father expresses it, "every believer, in spirit and in truth, is a prophet." Boaz presents a beautiful contrast with Ruth; with him, love comes of faith. The chief and special reason why he does good to her, is, that she is a guest in Israel, a dove under Jehovah's protection,—that love has made her a believer. His religion has the uppermost place in his soul. It gives birth to his works—it makes him conscious of his duty as an Israelite. It gives him also that delicacy of perception which enables him to sympathize with the anxiety, lonesomeness, and isolation, which attend an entrance into a new land, among a new people. Only a genuine believer is truly discreet. Refinement of the heart springs only of faith. There may be a lack of courtly manners; but the most elevated style of intercourse with men, and the truest politeness, are the natural outgrowth of a disposition permeated with the humility of the gospel of truth.

STARKE: "This also is given to pious souls by God, that being devoted to him, he often secretly, and even without their becoming aware of it, impels them to this or that good action." THE SAME: "A meritorious person may well enough be informed that his merits, or whatever there be worthy of praise and love about him, are recognized and properly estimated."

VERSES 18-23.

The Beginning of the Blessing.

- 18 And she took it up, and went [came] into the city: and her mother-in-law saw<sup>1</sup> what she had gleaned: and she brought forth, and gave to her that she had reserved
19 [left over] after she was sufficed [satisfied]. And her mother-in-law said unto her, Where hast thou gleaned to-day? and where wroughtest<sup>2</sup> thou? blessed be he that did take knowledge [friendly notice] of thee. And she shewed her mother-in-law with whom she had wrought, and said, The man's name with whom I wrought to-day
20 is Boaz. And Naomi said unto her daughter-in-law, Blessed be he of the Lord [Jehovah], who hath not left off his kindness to the living and to the dead.<sup>3</sup> And Naomi said unto her, The man is near of kin [related, lit. near, i. e. near, not in comparison with other relatives, but with men in general] unto us, one of our next kinsmen [one of our 21 redeemers]. And Ruth the Moabitess said, He said unto me also,<sup>4</sup> Thou shalt keep 22 fast by my young men [by my people], until they have ended all my harvest. And Naomi said unto Ruth her daughter-in-law, It is good, my daughter, that thou go out
23 [only] with his maidens, that they meet [maltreat] thee not in any other field. So she kept fast by the maidens of Boaz to glean unto the end of barley-harvest and of wheat-harvest; and dwelt [and then she abode, remained] with her mother-in-law.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 18. — וַתֵּרָא חֲמוּלָהּ]: Wright points the first word as Hiph., וַתֵּרָא, "and she showed." "So we prefer to read, following the Vulg., Syr., and Arab. It is rather harsh with the ordinary punctuation to make וַתֵּרָא the nom. to וַתֵּרָא (so pointed by the majority of MSS.), when Ruth is the subject of all the verbs that precede and of those that follow immediately after. Two of Kennicott and De Rossi's MSS. read וַתֵּרָא חֲמוּלָהּ, which would seem to imply a reading וַתֵּרָא; but while two of my own MSS. have the reading וַתֵּרָא חֲמוּלָהּ, either by first or second hand, the verb is pointed as ordinarily, וַתֵּרָא." The absence of וַתֵּרָא does not prove that חֲמוּלָהּ is not an accus., cf. Ges. 117, 2. — Tr.]

[2 Ver. 19. — עָשִׂיתָ: used absolutely for "to labor," as in Prov. xxx. 18; Job xxiii. 9. Dr. Cassel translates: "und woher hast du (dies) geschafft," i. e. "and where (woher, whence, freely for wo, where) didst thou procure (עָשִׂיתָ, acquire, make, cf. Gen. xxi. 1; 2 Sam. xv. 1), this?" But, 1, in this sense the verb could hardly be left without an object; and, 2, the word must have the same sense here in the question which it has in the answer in the next clause. Wright prefers to render "where hast thou stayed," i. e. spent the time, עָשִׂיתָ being understood (cf. Eccles. vi. 12 and the phrase τοὺς χρόνους, Acts xv. 33). But when the talk is of gleaning, it is certainly more natural for Ruth to say, "the man with whom (on whose fields) I worked to-day is Boaz," than "the man with whom I spent my time to-day," etc. Wright says that "Gesenius in the Lex. Man. prefers this rendering." It is not impossible that Ges. may have varied in different editions; but he has no such preference in the sixth edit. of his German Handwörterbuch, nor in Robinson's transl. of his Lat. Lex. Man. — In לֵילִי, the force of לֵיל local is lost, as in לֵילִי = לֵילִי, לֵילִי = לֵילִי. — Tr.]

[8 Ver. 20. — וְאֵתֵּימְרָם וְאֵתֵּימְרָם. "with reference to the living and the dead." Accusatives of the objects to which the kindness is done, cf. Ges. 189, 2. "The verb עָזַב is here construed with a double accusative; for if אֵת were used as a preposition, it would have to be מֵאֵת as we find מֵעַם in Gen. xxiv. 27" (Keil). — מִנְפָּלָטִי according to Ges. (Lex. s. v. מִן and מִן) is a sg. noun, מִנְפָּלָט, with the plur. suff. of first person = "our second goel." But as no such word is found elsewhere, and as there is no real difficulty in the way, the form in the text is to be taken as script. defect. for מִנְפָּלָטִי, and rendered "one of (on מִן in this sense, cf. Ges. 154, 3, c) our redeemers." — Tr.]

[4 Ver. 21. — בָּרַךְ: not "even so, i. e. may he be blessed, as you have said" (Wright), which with the following "for (כִּי) he said to me," etc., would make but a mercenary amen to Naomi's prayer, to say nothing of the fact that by the intervention of another clause the prayer is too far away; but, "also!" as we say, "more! I have not told you all; for he said," etc., cf. Ges. 155, 2, a. — On the periphrastic genitives of the verse, cf. Ges. 115, 1 — Tr.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Ver. 18 f. And her mother-in-law saw what she had gleaned. Naomi looked with astonishment at the large quantity brought home by Ruth; and her amazement increased when Ruth in addition produced and gave her the remains of her dinner. To this astonishment she gives utterance by asking, "Where hast thou been? in whose fields canst thou have been at work?" Piety, however, does more than indulge in curiosity simply. The natural heart would have rejoiced, received, enjoyed, and inquired just as Naomi did, but without thought except of self. She, on the contrary, before her inquiries are answered, induced simply by the abundance of the gifts and the manifest happiness of Ruth, blesses the giver. For this she needs not to know who he is. Whoever treated Ruth kindly and loaded her with presents, must have designed to indicate his appreciation of her lot and her virtues. He must know what Ruth has done, seeing he manifested so much solicitude for her, a Moabitess. "Blessed be he who has taken special notice of thee!" It had been a hard thing for her to send Ruth out for such work. The man who has treated her dear child so kindly that she comes home, not only enriched with presents, but also cheerful and happy, deserves a blessing, and that before she knows anything more. This done, Ruth has opportunity to relate the particulars of her good fortune, and finally gives the name of the man who has befriended her, namely, Boaz. She could not know what a consolation and joy the utterance of this name conveyed to Naomi.

Ver. 20. Blessed be he of Jehovah, who hath not left off his kindness to the living and to the dead. This peculiar exclamation of Naomi on hearing the name of Boaz is undoubtedly worthy of more careful attention than it has hitherto received. Light is thrown upon it by a passage in the history of Abraham. Eliezer has come to Aram, to procure a wife for Isaac from among Abraham's kindred. He is aware of the great importance which his master attaches to his mission. Arrived at the well outside of the city of his destination, he prays that Jehovah would so "order" it (וְיִצְרֶנּוּ, Gen. xxiv. 12), that he may there meet with the one appointed to answer the wishes of his master. And, in fact, it turns out that the affable maiden who draws water for himself and his camels, is Rebecca, the daughter of Bethuel, Abraham's nephew. The desired "ordering" has been vouchsafed, and the astonished Eliezer exclaims, "Blessed be Jehovah . . . who hath not left off his kindness," etc. (וְלֹא עָזַב) precisely the same expression as in our passage).

A similar providence has happened to Ruth (וַיִּהְיֶה מִקֵּדְהָ, ver. 3). Without knowing what field to select, she lights on that of Boaz. Without knowing who he is, she is favored by him. Naomi recognizes God's hand in this, even more profoundly than Eliezer did. It is to be remembered that above (ch. i. 13, 20, etc.) she has repeatedly lamented that God's hand is against her, that God has inflicted sorrow upon her. She has indicated that in her view this fate comes upon her because she—or properly her husband and sons, although she does not say this—went to Moab. In the wonderful providence which made Ruth find a friend in Boaz, the rich relative of her husband, she feels herself justified to find an indication that God is once more gracious to her, and has not left off his kindness. If now it was through the fault of her dear departed ones that she had hitherto experienced distress, then it also follows that, since God's goodness again manifests itself so conspicuously, his anger against those must likewise be come to an end. For that reason, she speaks of his kindness not only to the living but also to the dead. For these had died through the same sin which had brought suffering on herself. Hence, God's help to her in her suffering, is a manifestation of his unwearied grace toward both the living and the dead.

But it is certainly proper to find a yet farther meaning in these words. Independently of the special history of the family of Elimelech, this utterance of Naomi concerning God's kindness to the living and the dead, must have its absolute and general application. Indeed, it must be assumed that in using it, Naomi only applied a generally employed formula to her special case. When one says of God that "He does not leave off his kindness," he thereby praises him as the God of pardoning love; as the God who, though He tarry long, hears at last, and does not leave the penitent forsaken. In this shorter form, the expression was appropriate in the above-mentioned passage from Abraham's history. For Eliezer is in perplexity, and knows not well how to perform his task. But it was especially appropriate in the mouth of Naomi, who had thought herself wholly forsaken of God. And hence, it would seem natural to think that if the saying had not already been current in a fixed form, Naomi would have contented herself with saying, "Jehovah who hath not left off his kindness toward us," or "toward the widowed and the poor," etc. The kindness of God "toward the living and the dead," is the most general form of which the saying is susceptible. Now, that God does not leave off his kindness toward the living, is evident to believers from the history of every individual human being, of Israel, and of the world in general (Ps. liii. 4). The very existence of the world testifies of mercy that never ceases, of love that is never embittered. But wherein is his "kindness toward the dead" manifested? If these words do not presuppose the immortality of the soul, as an article of Israelitish faith, what meaning can they have? Although Naomi, reassured by the benevolent actions of Boaz, may regain confidence in God's mercy toward herself, she surely cannot speak of them as kindness to the dead, if the dead have no longer any being. In that case, the actions of Boaz, however viewed, are and continue to be kindness to the living only. God could indeed release the living from the consequences of the guilt of the dead; but when in one and the same mercy He is said to show kindness to the latter as well as to the former, this can have its ground only in the presupposition that the grave ends but this earthly state of existence. Bertheau and Keil both explain, in the same words, that God, "by his care for the widows, showed himself merciful to the husband and sons even after their death." But how can mercy be shown to such as exist no longer? It would never occur to any one to speak or think of that as a mercy to the dead, which, in whatever light it be put, is just mercy to the living, and nothing more. No; we have in this exclamation of Naomi a significant indication of the consciousness of the immortality of the soul which existed in Israel. It had its natural basis in that very mercy of God which does not cease. In this mercy the history of Israel in the world and in the domain of the spirit originated and lives. The Sadduceic doctrine was raised on no other foundation than an Epicurean negation of history. On the enduring mercy of God toward the living and the dead, rests our Saviour's great answer (Matth. xxii. 32): "God is not a God of the dead, but of the living."

Ver. 21 f. The man is related to us. Naomi, observing the astonishment of Ruth at her exclamation, explains the reason of it. (The "redeemer," גִּבּוֹר, will be treated of farther on.) That Ruth had been directed to the field of a blood-relative, seemed to her a sufficiently great mercy. For from all that Ruth had told her, it was evident that she was there well and securely situated. The fear lest Ruth might meet with rude treatment in the harvest-fields, must have been one of Naomi's chief anxieties. Ruth, having learned who Boaz is, now adds, as if she now understood the reason of it, what is not expressly brought out in the foregoing conversation, namely, that Boaz had given her permission to keep with his people (נְעָרִים) during the whole harvest-season. And it testifies again of the loving solicitude with which Naomi, like a tender mother, thinks for Ruth, that, as soon as she hears the latter repeat the words of Boaz about keeping with his נְעָרִים (people, maso<sup>1</sup>), she at once rejoins: "Good, my daughter, go with his maidens (נְעוּרָיו), that they injure thee not in any other field." She has in all this as yet no other thoughts than those of joy and gratitude toward God, that He has so ordered it as to direct Ruth to a relative on whose estate she can glean safely and profitably through the entire harvest, and thus provide the sustenance of both for a whole year. The great question, how to live, was by this providential intervention answered. The fear of want was dissipated and that without insult or shame. While all other means of help failed Naomi, she was first comforted by the love of her daughter-in-law, then upheld by her self-sacrifice, and finally saved from want by the fame of her virtues. Amid the sorrows that befell her in Moab, Naomi, as she herself acknowledged, was not altogether free from blame, for she too had gone thither; only Ruth of all the family had nothing to repent of; and it was through her that God now showed that He had not left off his kindness to the living and the dead.

Ver. 23. So she kept fast by the maidens of Boaz unto the end of the harvest. It is manifestly not without design that it is added concerning Ruth, that she continued with the maidens throughout the harvest-season. Her diligence did not relax from what it was the first day, although she now knew more than then. Her demeanor was modest and unassuming as ever, so that she returned to the field not otherwise than as she had left it. Her eyes were on the field; and to provide for her mother-in-law continued to be her only solicitude. Boaz had opportunity enough to observe this. He daily saw her gentle and virtuous conduct. Externally and internally, she was no longer a stranger to him. He doubtless found opportunities to show her favors. After an acquaintance so long and hearty, the narrative of chap. iii. is happily introduced.

And let us take heed that we do not recant and recall our prayers, after that we come to the knowledge of his name; as some do, who, when they see a laudable work, willingly commend the doer of it; but after they come to know the author's name (especially if they be prepossessed with a private spleen against him), they fall then to derogate and detract from the action, quarrelling with it as done out of ostentation, or some other sinister end."

BP. HALL: "If the rich can exchange their alms with the poor for blessings, they have no cause to complain of an ill bargain."

fem. form, which seems to show that at that time the distinction of gender was no longer neglected. נְעָרִים is here, as in Job i. 19, to be taken as including both sexes; there in the sense of "young people," here in that of "servants." — Th.]

"Kindness to the dead." The following remarks, though based on an interpretation which Dr. Cassel decidedly, and in so far as it assumes to be exhaustive, probably justly rejects, may nevertheless suggest a very true and useful line of thought. Its entire exclusion by our author is certainly an error. Nothing is more natural or universal than the feeling that kindness done to those left behind by the dead is kindness done to the dead themselves; but it may well be asked whether this feeling is rooted in anything else than the conviction, natural and instinctive, or otherwise, of the continued existence of the soul after death. FULLER: "To the dead. Art thou, then, a widower, who desirest to do mercy to thy dead wife; or a widow, to thy dead husband; or a child, to thy deceased parent? I will tell thee how thou mayest express thyself courteous. Hath thy wife, thy husband, or thy parent, any brother, or kinsman, or friends surviving? Be courteous to them; and, in so doing, thy favors shall redound to the dead. Though old Barzillai be incapable of thy favors, let young Chimham taste of thy kindness. Though the dead cannot, need not have thy mercy, yet may they receive thy kindness by a proxy, — by their friends that still are living." — TR.]

Obedience in Innocence.

1 Then [And] Naomi her mother-in-law said unto her, My daughter, shall I not seek

Boaz of our kindred [ iii. our acquaintance, i. e. relative], with whose maidens thou

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Ver. 1. Shall I not seek a resting-place for thee? The peculiar proceeding which these words introduce, may appear somewhat surprising when viewed from the standpoint of modern social life and relations. At all events, this explains why its psychological significance has not yet been properly appreciated. But the narrative of the fortunes of Ruth is so deeply embedded in the characteristic life of Israel, that in order to appreciate its full beauty, it is indispensable to enter thoroughly into the spirit of that life. Perhaps no history teaches more clearly than this, that when love and trust, in their childlike and therefore divine strength, first suffer and then conquer, there is a presentation in actual history of that which the highest works of the imagination present only, in idea.

That which made the fate of the daughter of Jephthah so sad, was that she never found a

"resting-place" in the house of a husband. With regard to woman, marriage was viewed as the natural fulfillment of her calling, without which her life was helpless and defenseless, as that of a people without a God. Hence the prayer of Naomi, when about to part from her daughters-in-law, that they may find "rest" in the house of a husband. Orpah returns because she fears never to find it in Israel. Ruth goes with her, because she places her love for Naomi above all other considerations. Then, indeed, the hearts of them all were filled with sorrow. But since then God's mercy has again become manifest. New hope has dawned upon their tears. What a beautiful and happy contrast presents itself now! The same mother-in-law who formerly, in her self-forgetfulness, bade her daughters-in-law return to Moab and find resting-places for themselves, is now in a position, self-forgetful as ever, to seek for Ruth the Moabitess a place in Israel, where it may be well with her. And what was the force that brought about this beautiful revolution? The love of Ruth which seeks not her own, the faithfulness of Naomi which deserved such love.

The understanding of what chap. iii. relates will be chiefly facilitated by a comparison with the beginning of chap. ii. While the women are in distress, it is Ruth who takes the initiative; now, when hope grows large, it is Naomi. When hardship was to be endured, the mother submitted her will to the daughter,—for Ruth was not sent to glean, she went of her own accord; now, when the endeavor is to secure the joy and happiness held out in prospect, the daughter yields in all things to the direction of the mother. The thought of labor for the mother originates with the daughter; but it is the mother who forms plans of happiness for the daughter. On both occasions, Ruth undertakes a mission. The first time she sets out, a stranger, without a definite place in view, and dressed in the garb of toil and mourning; the second time, with a definite plan, encouraged by the former success, and decked in holiday attire. And yet the second undertaking was not less hard than the first. Humiliation which she had to fear on the first, might also befall her on the second. Indeed, anything that might have befallen her on her first expedition, had not God ordered her goings, would have been far less wounding to her, the foreign and needy woman, than that which on this second expedition might pierce her sensitive heart. The first undertaking was more sorrowful, the second more delicate. At the first she could act openly, at the second only secretly. Then the worst risk she ran was to suffer hunger, now her honor is at stake. The faithfulness to Naomi which she then showed was not greater than the obedience which she now manifests.

And yet Naomi is as little to be reproached for sending Ruth on this second mission, as she was for accepting her proposal to go on the first. On the contrary, her course rather shows that she did not bear her name, or had won such love among strangers, for nothing.

Neither journey of Ruth, taken with the approbation of Naomi, can be measured by modern measuring-rules. They are not attempts at speculative adventure. In both cases, what was done was in accordance with unimpeachable rights afforded by Israelitish law and custom.

When Ruth went to the field to glean, she only asked a right guaranteed to the widowed and the poor. To deny her the privilege of gleaning would have been to deprive her of her right; to injure or put her to shame in the exercise of it, would have been to diminish it. True, the liberal treatment she received from Boaz was no longer a right to be claimed, but the expression of good-will and kindness. Naomi recognized in this the providential arrangement of God. And it is precisely this also that gives courage to Ruth to claim for herself and for Naomi the second right to which she is entitled.

It was an ancient law in Israel, sanctioned by the Mosaic legislation (Deut. xxv. 5), that when a man died without issue, his brother was bound to marry his widow. This is a right of the woman. She can demand it of him, and if he refuses, put him openly to shame. How early and deeply this usage was rooted in Israel, may be seen from Gen. xxxviii., where the death of Onan is ascribed to his refusal to marry the widow Tamar. The significance of this usage is clear. It is also found among other nations, although distorted and rendered impure. It rests on the historical feeling of the nations, which leads them to attach importance to the preservation not only of the national spirit, but also of the national body, by propagation. In the first psalm, the pious man is compared with a tree whose leaf never withers. And the tree is, in fact, the image best adapted to explain the reason of the usage in question. It is not without reason that the founder of a people is called its stammvater [stem-father, trunk-father, cf. the Heb.

terms שֹׁרֵט and שֹׁבֵט shoot, sprout, branch, used for "tribe."—Tr.]. United about this common trunk, the ancient peoples distinguished themselves nationally (from nasci) very sharply from those who were not his offshoots.<sup>1</sup> The different families are the branches of this tree. But the head of a family is in his turn a stem, putting forth boughs, as a tree puts forth branches.

The withering of the tree is the image of death. As no branch in the tree, so no member in the family, should perish. Now, the nation lives in its families. Hence, if a man dies without children, it is as if a branch withered in the tree. To remedy this, a new branch is, as it were, engrafted on the tree. This is done when the brother marries the widow, and regards the son she bears as heir to the name and possessions of the deceased husband. But what if there be no brother? Is the name then to be after all extinguished and the branch to be forever wanting? The law, as given in Deut. xxv. 5 ff., does not indeed declare it, but it is an inference in accordance with its spirit, that in that case the obligation passes over to the nearest relatives of the deceased. Every family—such is manifestly the idea of the usage—must take care that no member in it dies out. What the brother is to the brother, that, when he has no brother, his more distant blood-relatives must be. The letter of the law, it is true, did not command this; but, as the narrative of our Book shows, the spirit of that usage which the law sanctioned, required it. Naomi, by way of explaining to her daughter-in-law her joy over the way in which God had ordered her steps, says, Boaz is related (קָרִיב, like propinquus) to us, he belongs to our goel (גֹּאֵל). The word gaal (גָּאֵל), to which goel belongs, is philologically and in its original signification one and the same with the Greek λύω, "to loose."<sup>2</sup> It is not to be ascribed to the same root with the similarly sounding גָּעַל, although it is true that, owing to the well-known interchange of נ and ג, it sometimes occurs instead of it.<sup>3</sup> The latter word means, "to pollute;" and is related to the former

1 The sensual abuse into which the practice of levirate marriage is said to have fallen among the Nairs of Malabar, has extinguished the family proper among them. All are blood-relatives. They are a tree without branches. The correction of many of the views of Bohlen, altes Indien, II. 142, however much they need it, cannot here be undertaken.

2 Fürst (Concordantie, s. v. גָּאֵל) has truly remarked that גָּאֵל was lengthened from גָּל, as לָאֵשׁ from לָשׁ.

This גָּל, originally related to both λύω and λύο, has retained its g, which in the ancient languages has been frequently thrown off. The copious discussion of Benfey, Gr. Gram. II. 119-124, should be compared.

3 The few instances, Isa. lix. 8, lxiii. 8, Zeph. v. 1, Mal. i. 7, 12, Lam. iv. 14, in which גָּעַל—גָּעַל written as the Latin luo, pollute (cf. lutum, pol-luo), to the Greek λύω, "to loose." The correspondence of the ideas "to redeem" and "to loose," in their external relationship, testifies, both in Hebrew and in Indo-germanic, to their internal mutual connection. The idea currently attached in Israel to the term gaal, "to loose," is everywhere definitely determined by the conception of the people as an historical organism. By this it was defined mainly as a "redeeming" [einlösen, "inloosing," from ein, "in," and lösen, "to loose;" i. e. a loosing of that which has been bound, by means of which it is brought back into its original position (e. g. a captive into his home, a slave into his freedom) or ownership (e. g. a piece of land, a promissory note, etc.). — Tr.]<sup>1</sup> According to the social philosophy of the Mosaic law, no member of the national organism was to perish, no branch of the tree was to wither. Whatever had been dislocated by natural events was to be re-set; whatever had been alienated must be redeemed. This applied, as an example in our Book itself teaches, to lands as well as to persons; and the duty of redemption rested, as within the nation, so within the families into which the nation branched out. No one could redeem anything for a family, who did not belong to it by blood-relationship. Hence also the transition of the idea of goel into that of blood-relative was perfectly natural. Properly speaking, there could be no redeemer who was not a blood-relative. The meaning of the word is profoundly set forth in the various grand historical unfoldings of its idea. For every redemption [einlösung, "inloosing,"] has always been a setting free [lösung, "loosing"], albeit not always without security. The Greek λύω also passes over into the idea of "setting free," "releasing." Dionysos, in his character as god of the spring-season, is called Lysios, the Liberator. The Liberator of Israel is God. He frees out of and from servitude. For that reason, the Messiah who delivers Israel is especially called Goel. When he appears, he will come as Israel's blood-relation and brother, as Christ was. The dismal counterpart of the goel as redeemer and deliverer, is the goel as blood-avenger. He owes his origin to the opinion, which slowly and painfully disappeared in Israel,<sup>2</sup> but which is still partially prevalent in the East, and inspires many current superstitions, that the blood of the slain cannot be put to rest and liberated, until his murderer has been killed. The duty of this blood-revenge rests upon the blood-relatives, not only on the brother, strictly so called, but on the nearest relative, whoever he may be. So far this terrible usage becomes instructive with reference to the beneficent national custom which made it the duty of the blood-relative not to let the house of his kinsman die out; for this also was a blood-redemption, not unto death, however, but unto happiness and peace. The goel was no judge — as with an N — occurs in the sense "to pollute," should not have been placed under לֹאֵל, "to loose," in the concordance [cf. Fürst]. No one would identify luo (polluo) with λύω in that way.

1 Our lösen, "to loose," also, has in M. H. Germ. the sense of einlösen, "to redeem," "to ransom," sc. a pledge, land, etc. It occurs in this sense in poets and documents, especially Low German, cf. Riedel, Cod. Brand, i. 2, 207: "van den drozsten dat land losete." In another document Herr Heinrich von Mecklenburg is to "ledigen und lösen (einlösen) alle hus und stede und de land;" cf. Kröcher, Erkundenbuch zur Gesch. des Geschlechts, i. 172; also, i. 143, etc.

also the greatest Goel came not to judge the world — but a comforter, a dispenser of life and love.

Ver. 2. Is not Boaz of our kindred? By these words Naomi explains to Ruth the right she has to engage in the undertaking she is about to recommend. His relationship gives her a right to apply to him for a performance of its duties. It is not to be thought singular that, if Ruth had this right of marriage, the first motion toward its fulfillment did not come from Boaz. In the first place, it was in accordance with ancient usage to leave the assertion of a right with its possessor. It was not the duty of a landowner, for example, to go after the poor, and make them glean; but it was his duty not to forbid them, when they came. In the next place, however, we learn farther on that Boaz was not the nearest relative. The objection which Ruth in her humility might find in her Moabitish nationality, or which she might entertain even without reference to that fact, is met by Naomi in the words: "with whose maidens thou wast." She thus reminds Ruth that Boaz, so far from slighting her on account of her nationality, has distinguished her, and put her on perfect equality with his Israelitish work-people.

Behold, he winnoweth barley to-night in the threshing-floor.<sup>3</sup> This remark shows that since Ruth's participation in the harvest of Boaz, Naomi must have come into closer connection with her relative. She is minutely informed of what he does and where he is. We must also suppose that it had not escaped her how much kindness Boaz had shown to Ruth. She could not but feel sure that the claim which Ruth was to prefer, would not be addressed to a hard and unsympathetic heart. On the other hand, it was natural to think that although Boaz was an elderly man, Ruth must be heartily attached to him. It was he, whose kindness fell like a first beam of light on her sadness. Such an impression, after scenes and moods like those through which Ruth had passed, is never lost. She went forth on her first undertaking at the beginning of barley-harvest; she enters on the second, when the barley is winnowed on the threshing-floor. Between the two there lies an interval of time sufficient to explain how Naomi could have the courage and the information necessary to send her daughter on such an errand.

Ver. 3 ff. But let not thyself be perceived by the man. Ruth was directed to pay special attention to the adornment of her person, to which, to this extent at least, she had since the death of her husband been a stranger. She is to lay aside the weeds of mourning and the garments of toil, and after bathing and anointing, don the festive garb; for the expedition on which she goes is of a joyous, bridal nature. All this, however, is not done in order to win Boaz by external beauty; for she is specially cautioned against allowing him to see her by day. But why this caution? Boaz was a believing Israelite, and therefore also a man of strict morals. It would have perplexed and displeased him to think that anybody else had seen Ruth, and might suspect both her and himself of an illicit meeting on the solitary threshing-floor. He would have scarcely listened to her, but removed her at once. The purpose for which she came had also an appropriate symbolism, which any previous meeting would have disturbed. By whatever means, Naomi knew that this night — for it was in the night that Ruth was to present her petition — Boaz was to be alone on the threshing-floor. The floor, albeit not entirely closed in, may have been partially surrounded by some sort of fencing, by means of which Ruth could conceal herself until the proper time, and within which Boaz ate and drank. Most probably the grain-heaps themselves formed the natural boundaries, between which, accordingly, Boaz also betook himself to repose.

<sup>3</sup> [Winnowing is done by tossing the mingled grain and chaff up into the air, when the chaff is blown away to a distance, while the heavier grain falls straight down. Hence, the evening and early night when a cool wind frequently arises after hot, sultry days (cf. Gen. iii. 8), was taken advantage of by Boaz for this work. For "to-night," the Targum has, "in the night wind." On threshing and threshing-floors, cf. Rob. i. 550; Thomson, ii. 314 ff. — Tr.]

Ver. 6. And did according to all that her mother-in-law bade her. Ruth was to do something a little beyond what the prudence and delicacy of a woman ordinarily permitted. For that reason, it is expressly repeated that she did as her mother-in-law directed her. She was justly confident that the latter would order nothing that could injure her. True love, such as Ruth cherished for Naomi, always includes perfect obedience. It was not in Ruth that the thought of a new marriage had originated. Her heart had no other thought than to serve Naomi like a dutiful child. But Naomi, equally self-forgetful, busied herself with plans for a "resting-place for her child." She, too, thought not of herself only, but of Ruth. She had undoubtedly done all that was in her power by way of preparation, before she directed Ruth to take the decisive step. From that step she could not save her, for custom devolved it on her. It is the beauty of the present instance, that this custom compelled Ruth to nothing that was against her will. For although she acted in a matter regulated by law, it was not settled in this case that Boaz was the right man. So much the more essential was it that, by Ruth's personal action, the perfect freedom and inclination of the woman should be manifested. The greater the stress that was laid on this by the whole symbolic proceeding, the more significant is the remark that Ruth "did everything, as her mother-in-law commanded her."

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

"Go down to the threshing-floor." Love speaks only of duties, not of rights. Ruth offered to go to the field and glean; but of the right of redemption which she had, she said nothing. She thought of the duties that devolve on the poor, but not of her right to marriage. In going to Boaz, she manifested the obedience of love, the most difficult of all love's performances. It is much to toil for a loved one, to humble one's self, to give up everything, and to forget the past; but the hardest thing for a woman is to conquer the fears of feminine delicacy, to quiet the apprehensions of the heart, and that not by boldly transgressing moral law, but by virtue. Ruth's visit to Boaz in the night was harder for her, than it is for a young girl to leave home and enter service. Her obedience in this matter was the utmost sacrifice she could make. She risked her womanly feelings; and that to a virtuous woman is more than to risk life. She claimed a right, to claim which was more painful than the heaviest duties. But her self-forgetful love pours an auroral glow of divine purity over everything. Her love was not the sensual love of romances. She loved Naomi, her mother; and in order to procure honor and love in Israel for this mother, and to save the name of her deceased husband from extinction, she does what only a chaste woman, inspired by the obedience of love dare do, and what the polluted eyes of impure souls never understand. Vanity and self-interest had found but a slight trial in her undertaking. To virtue and ancient patriarchal manners, the visit of Ruth to Boaz was the utmost of womanly endurance. It was harder for Ruth to don her best attire for this purpose, than to go about in her working clothes. For virtue would rather put on sackcloth and ashes, than the garments of a joy which may easily be misconceived. It is more of a martyrdom to face the possibility of appearing as a sinner, than to suffer punishment for the sake of virtue. But the chaste love of obedience succeeds in everything. Ruth conquers, and is neither seen nor misapprehended. She receives the crown of love and faith.

[1 Ver. 7. — סְתֵרָה: not "secretly" (Kell), which would be superfluous here; but as in Judg. iv. 21, "quietly," "softly," so as not to wake the sleeper — in a muffled manner, cf. Lex. s. v. סְתֵרָה. — T<sub>a</sub>.]

[2 Ver. 9 — כַּנְפֵּי must be regarded as dual, with the suffix defect. written (Ges. 91, 2, Rom. 1); for as the word does not stand in pause, the seghol cannot be a mere lengthened sheva (Ges. 29, 4, b). The Masoretic tradition, therefore, understands "wings" here, and not "skirt," or "coverlet," in which sense the word is always used in the singular. The covering wing is a favorite emblem of protection in the psalms and elsewhere, and is here far more beautiful and suggestive than "skirt" or "coverlet," even though the translation of the metaphor into the language of action did carry with it an actual spreading of the skirt over one, cf. the commentary. The rendering "wings" is also adopted by Bertheau, Kell, Wright, etc. — T<sub>a</sub>.]

[3 Ver. 10. — Dr. Cassel: du hast deine Liebe, die spätere, noch schöner gemacht, als die erste; or, as Dr. Wordsworth very happily, as well as literally renders: "thou hast bettered (הֵיטֵרָה) thy latter loving kindness above the former." The comparison is not as to quantity, but as to quality. — T<sub>a</sub>.]

[4 Ver. 11. — אִשָּׁתֵּי כֹחַ: lit. "a woman of strength." Dr. Cassel here renders it (with DeWette) by weackeres Weib, brave, valiant woman, while he afterwards (see foot-note on p. 48) substitutes braves Weib, i. e. good, excellent woman (so also Kell). Others: "capable woman." All these renderings, including that of the E. V. (which is not to be taken in the restricted sense of "chaste," but in that of its Latin original), agree much better than they seem to do. They are all embraced in אִשָּׁתֵּי כֹחַ, which is here manifestly used of moral strength, cf. Prov. xii. 4, xxxi. 10. A morally strong person is brave and good, capable in the noblest sense; in a word virtuous, possessed both of virtue and of virtues. — T<sub>a</sub>.]

[5 Ver. 12. — "פֶּי" before אֲמַנְתִּי, in order to strengthen the assurance: 'and now, truly indeed,' cf. Job xxxvi. 4. Beside the Kethibh אֲמַנְתִּי פֶּי, we have here, as in 2 Sam. xiii. 38, xv. 21; Jer. xxxix. 12, the Keri פֶּי. After the asseverating אֲמַנְתִּי פֶּי occurs in Job xii. 2, as elsewhere after an oath, Gen. xxii. 16 f.; 2 Kgs. iii. 14: but אֲמַנְתִּי פֶּי occurs also in such a position, 2 Sam. xv. 21 (Kethibh); 2 Kgs. v. 20; Jer. ii. 14, cf. Ew. 356 b.; and there is therefore no ground for preferring the easier reading of the Keri, especially as אֲמַנְתִּי פֶּי excludes from the assurance the opposite of what forms its object yet more decidedly than the simple פֶּי, thus: truly, indeed, only a goal am I = truly, I am certainly a goal — I am that and nothing else." (Bertheau.) Kell also thinks that the meaning of אֲמַנְתִּי פֶּי is to be explained from its use in the sense of nisi, cf. Lex. — T<sub>a</sub>.]

6 Ver. 13. — לִיָּי. The MSS. have here either a large ל or a large י. The Masora parva remarks that the Oriental (i. e. Babylonian) Jews, especially preserve the large ל. Many conjectures as to the meaning of the large letter are clearly wide of the mark. The ground of such majuscula is undoubtedly to be sought in the purpose of ancient transcribers (as Le Clerc rightly intimates), to direct the attention of the reader to facts or thoughts which to them appeared especially noteworthy. Thus in Eccles. vii. 1, where the first letter of שִׁיר is a majuscula. The value of a good name impressed itself here. So also in Eccles. xii. 13, where the ס in סִיחָה is written large. The fidelity of later transcribers, unwilling to obliterate any, even subjective marks, has preserved such peculiarities. With doctrine or any special exegesis, these letters have nothing to do. Thus, in Eccl. i. 6, the transcriber, wishing to direct attention to the splendor of the royal banquet, the description of which begins with וְהָיָה, wrote וְהָיָה large. And so in our passage, it seemed important to the pious transcriber (as Buxtorf not without reason indicates), to call the reader's attention to the language and moral conduct of Boaz.

7 Ver. 14. — Instead of the usual וְהָיָה, we have here, and only here, וְהָיָה in Kethibh. The pointing וְהָיָה was occasioned by the endeavor to derive the word from a specifically Hebrew root. I hold the form וְהָיָה, וְהָיָה, to be itself original. Comparative philology satisfactorily explains the word. It belongs to πρίν, πρώτος, primus, parama, Goth. fruma (as וְהָיָה belongs to purus, וְהָיָה to paries, etc.), and is not at all to be explained from the Hebrew. The Midraah (Ruth Rabba 84 d.) has also noted the reading וְהָיָה, and in its usual way explains the added וְ of six hours, which Ruth spent in the threshing-floor. [According to Bertheau וְהָיָה is a later Aramaic form for the old, genuine Heb. וְהָיָה, and is by Aram. analogy to be pronounced וְהָיָה. Not likely; as וְהָיָה is not found in Aram. Fürst derives it from וְהָיָה (וְהָיָה, an unused root, meaning "to wait") with the termination וְהָיָה. Ewald seems to regard וְהָיָה as a shortened (?) form of וְהָיָה, which he derives from וְהָיָה, an unused root, meaning "to be fresh," cf. Lehrb. 837 c. — Ta.]

[8 Ver. 15. — וְהָיָה (וְהָיָה, milei), as it is written in most MSS., is the second per. sg. fem. imperat. of וְהָיָה, to give, cf. Ges. 69, 3, Rom. 2. The reading וְהָיָה, found in some MSS. is either for וְהָיָה (i. e. the high. inf. const. of וְהָיָה used imperatively, like an infin. absol.), or better for וְהָיָה, second fem. imper., cf. Green, Gram. 164, 2. — On the וְהָיָה, Wright quotes the following explanation from Schroeder, De Vest. Mul. Heb.: "Quia adeo ampla erant veterum pallia, ut pars in humerum rejiceretur, altera brachio subduceretur, Rutha, prehensens aliquam partem ejus sinu oblatas a Boaso fruges exceptit. Imo aliam vestem quam pallium ne admittere quidem ipse textus videtur. Nam ex verbis וְהָיָה, da vestem quae est super te, haud obscure colligitur, vestem intelligendum esse totum corpus tegentem; quoniam alias pro genio linguae Hebraeae, specialius membrum corporis cui illa applicata fuisset, expressis potius verbis fuisset nominatum. Accedit quod aliud quodcunque tegumentum, nonnisi uni corporis parti, v. g. capiti, distinctum, ad usum, quem volebat Boasus, fuisset ineptum. Neque insolitum id veteribus fuit, ut in sinu vestimentis exterioris aliquid deportarent." — Ta.]

[9 Ver. 15. — וְהָיָה, "and he went." Wright proposes to read וְהָיָה, "and she went," on the ground that many MSS. have this reading, and that there seems to be no reason why Boaz should go to the city at so early an hour. The MS. authority, however, loses all its force when the strong probability is considered that the reading is only a conjectural emendation. Wright's other ground is by no means decisive. The simple idea is, that Boaz, after he had dismissed Ruth, also went to the city, probably to his house, whence afterwards he "went up" (וְהָיָה, expressive of the reverence with which the mind regards the place of judgment, cf. Deut. xvii. 8), to the gate, ch. iv. 1. So Kell; but cf. Dr. Cassel on ch. iv. 1. — Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Ver. 7. And Boaz ate and drank, and was cheerful. It illustrates the simplicity of ancient patriarchal times and manners, that Boaz, the wealthy proprietor of a great estate, himself keeps watch on his threshing-floor, works till late, and then betakes himself to rest in the solitude of the open field.<sup>1</sup> It is clear that he did not do this every day; for the well-informed Naomi says, "to-night he winnows barley." It is probable that this night he relieved his overseer. The remark, that "his heart was cheerful," is not added without a reason. It is not, however, intended to indicate that this was why Ruth was directed to present her petition after he had eaten and drunk. It is true, indeed, that it was a current and probably well-founded maxim among the ancients that requests should not be made of great men before, but after eating (cf. Esth. vii. 3), they being then more kindly disposed. But Ruth made no use of this post-prandial benevolence, for she allowed Boaz to betake himself to rest before she approached him. These words are rather designed to point out the danger encountered by Ruth on the one hand, and the virtue of Boaz on the other.

1 [The same practice is still continued in Palestine, cf. Rob. ii. 83; Thomson, ii. 511. Its design is, of course, to keep the grain from being stolen. Thomson says, that "it is not unusual for husband, wife, and all the family to encamp at the threshing-floors, and remain until the harvest is over." — Ta.]

Ver. 8. And it came to pass at midnight, etc. Boaz had laid himself down; it had become dark. Thereupon Ruth had come, and had laid herself softly down at his feet, drawing over herself a part of the cover under which he lay. The simple narrative paints most beautifully. It was midnight, when, perhaps, by a movement of his foot, bringing it in contact with the person of Ruth, he was startled out of his sleep. He bends himself forward<sup>2</sup> in order to see what it is he touches, and lo, a woman lies at his feet! He says, Who art thou? and she answers:

Ver. 9. I am Ruth thine handmaid; spread thy wings over thy handmaid; for thou art a redeemer. Ruth had been sent to demand the fulfillment of an ancient right. This right, peculiar as it was, had its symbol, under which it was claimed. We are made acquainted with it by the words addressed by Ruth to Boaz, and by her action in drawing an end of his coverlet over herself. The words are not contained in the instructions of Naomi to Ruth, as to what she is to do; but the action taught her, necessarily presupposes them. Marriage is a resting-place. The wife finds rest under the protection of her husband, as Israel finds it under the overshadowing wing of Jehovah.

2 וְהָיָה, as it is said of Sampson, Judg. xvi. 29, that he bent over the pillars, וְהָיָה.

Even until the latest times, the figurative representation of God as the loving Bridegroom of his people, continues, instructively and sublimely, to run through Scripture and tradition. Christ says (Matt. xxiii. 37): "How often would I have gathered you, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings." Israel has rest (menuchah) when God spreads out his wings over them. The psalmist prays to be covered by the shadow of Jehovah's wings. Boaz says to Ruth (chap. ii. 12): "May thy reward be complete, since thou hast come to take refuge under the wings of Jehovah, the God of Israel." That which Ruth there did with respect to the God of Boaz, she now asks to be permitted to do with respect to Boaz himself. The husband gives "rest" to his wife by spreading out his wings over her. For this reason the covering of his bed, under which he took the wife, was designated by the beautiful term, "wing" (cf. Deut. xxiii. 1 [E. V. xxii. 30], etc.). Very attractive is the use of this expression, with figurative application to God, in Ezekiel, when Jehovah, speaking through the prophet, says (ch. xvi. 8): "Behold, thy time was the time of love; and I spread out my wing over thee, and covered thy nakedness, . . . and entered into a covenant with thee." As the chicken takes refuge under the wings of the hen, so Ruth hid herself under a corner of the coverlet of Boaz. It was the symbol of the right which she had come to claim. "Spread out thy wings over thy handmaid; for thou art a redeemer (goel)." It is because he is a blood-relative that she can make this demand. Hence, she does not say, I am Ruth, the Moabitess; but, I am Ruth, thy handmaid. Here, where she lays claim to an Israelitish right, she drops all remembrance of Moab. And has he not himself received and treated her as an Israelitish maiden?

Undoubtedly this symbolical method of claiming the most delicate of all rights, presupposes manners of patriarchal simplicity and virtue. The confidence of the woman reposes itself on the honor of the man. The method, however, was one which could not easily be brought into operation. For every foreknowledge or pre-intimation of it would have torn the veil of silence and secrecy from the modesty of the claimant. But when it was once put into operation, the petition preferred could not be denied without disgrace either to the woman or the man. Hence, we may be sure that Naomi did not send her daughter-in-law on this errand without the fullest confidence that it would prove successful. For it is certain that to all other difficulties, this peculiar one was added in the present case: namely, that Boaz, as Ruth herself says, was indeed a goel, but not the goel. The answer of Boaz, also, suggests the surmise that such a claim was not wholly unexpected by him. Not that he had an understanding with Naomi, in consequence of which he was alone on the threshing-floor; for the fact that he was startled out of his sleep, shows that the night visit was altogether unlooked for. But the thought that at some time the claim of Ruth to the rights of blood-relationship might be addressed to himself, may not have been strange to him. Even this conjecture, however, of what might possibly or probably take place, could not be used to relieve Ruth of the necessity of manifesting her own free will by means of the symbolical proceeding. The ancient usage spoke a discreet language, with which not even a certain mutual understanding would have dispensed. For the rest, how truly the action of Ruth, far from clouding her womanly delicacy, was a new evidence of

Ver. 10. Blessed be thou of Jehovah, my daughter! Thou hast made thy latter kindness even more beautiful than the former. This answer also opens to our view the simple, unassuming soul of Boaz, whose modesty and sincere heartiness are truly admirable. He makes no complaint of being disturbed in the night, nor of the too great importunateness, as another might have deemed it, with which the request is made. On the one hand, he entertains no thought of abusing the confidence of the woman, nor on the other does he play the modern conservator of virtue, who loudly blames another because he distrusts himself. He has only words of divine benediction for the blameless woman, so attractive in her naive humility. He knows how to value her act in its purely objective character, apart from every consideration of its relation to himself, as only a heart trained by the word of God could do. He blesses Ruth, whom like a father he addresses as "my daughter," because he found her present kindness yet nobler and more beautiful than the former. But how is that to be understood? Ruth's former kindness approved itself, when, after the death of her husband, she left parents and home in order to console and take care of her mother-in-law, unmoved by the certainty of misery and humiliation in a foreign land. What does she now? Young, comely, and favorably known, she might before this have looked out a husband according to her wish, rich or poor, from among the young men of Israel. Did she do it? By no means; she subordinates every such possibility to her mother-in-law and the usages of Israel. Instead of preferring the love of a young man, as were natural, — says Boaz, — thou comest to assert thy right with one more advanced in life, solely because he is a goel. Thou askest him for the protection of his wings, in order that a blood-relative may again raise up a name for thy husband and mother-in-law in Israel. In this, also, thou offerest thine own heart and happiness as a sacrifice of love to thy family! It is indeed possible that as Boaz intimates, Ruth's present act of kindness was even a severer test of her love than the earlier. For those, done in the time of sorrow and mourning, were for that very reason easier than this, rendered at a time when perhaps a new life and fresh joy had been offered her. But the modesty of Boaz was too great. It is doubtless correct to think of him as a contemporary of Elimelech, and consequently no longer young. But in ancient as in modern times, a woman like Ruth will find a more engaging "rest" with a man like Boaz than she would find among thousands of young men.

Ver. 11. And now, my daughter, fear not. Trembling with excitement, Ruth had done as she had been directed; and in the darkness of the night, the tremulous tones of her voice had informed Boaz of her anxiety. What he had hitherto said, contained no decision, but only praise. She, however, trembles for the answer to her prayer, on which so much depended. Hence, he says, again addressing her by the kindly name of daughter, "fear not." As above he invoked on her, in Jehovah's name, a full reward, because, led by love to Israel, she had trustfully come to take refuge under the wings of Israel's God, so he will not deny her who has come to himself to ask for the protection of his "resting-place." Her Moabitish nationality can offer no obstacle, since he has already commended her to the blessing of Jehovah. She has shown no Moabitish morals. There exists no ground whatever for denying her the rights of Israel. For the whole gate of my people knows that thou art a brave woman. In the words "my people," he hints at the sole reason on which a refusal could base itself. But there is no Israelite among us in Bethlehem, who does not know how good thou art.<sup>1</sup> Whatever thou hast a right to claim, can be unhesitatingly done for thee, for thou art loved by all.

Ver. 12. But yet there is a redeemer nearer than I.<sup>2</sup> These words teach us that what Ruth demanded was an actual objective right, which belonged to her. Although Boaz perhaps surmised that, apart from the consideration of her right, she applied with special confidence to himself for the boon desired, he modestly and considerately decides only on the question of her formal right. Her proceeding receives its unimpeachable justification only when putting aside every personal inclination, it simply regards the matter of right. Thy claim, he says, cannot be gainsaid; but I am not the one to whom it is to be directed in the first instance. There is another, who is more nearly related to Elimelech. But he does not leave her a moment in doubt, whether this be not an excuse for refusing her petition. If that other person prove not able to fulfill his duty, then he himself will do it. This he confirms with an oath by the living God. Nor will she be required to repeat the proceeding of this night. A noble, womanly heart — this is what his tenderness implies — does not dare to undertake such a mission more than once. He himself will prosecute the matter. The symbolic act with which she came to him, addressed itself not so much to him, individually, as through him to the whole family. Perhaps he knew very well that Naomi had for good reasons sent Ruth to his threshing-floor, — that the other relative would not be able to act as redeemer; but it is best for both Ruth and himself that due regard be had to formal right.

Ver. 13 ff. Abide here to-night; lie down until the morning. He repeats the same injunction twice. He cannot send her away in the darkness of night; nor is he afraid to let her remain. She, for her part, hears his words, and obeys, with equal confidence. But she is only to remain till earliest dawn. Before it was possible to recognize each other clearly,<sup>3</sup> both were up; that it might not be known that the woman came into the floor.<sup>4</sup> By an early departure, he hopes that Ruth may escape meeting with any one, who might put injurious suspicions into circulation. He undoubtedly speaks of "the woman," with special emphasis. It would have been very unpleasant to Boaz to have people connect himself with any woman in a suspicious way; but scandalous rumors of this kind, with Ruth for their object, would have been exceedingly injurious. To say nothing of the fact that an undeserved stain would have been fixed on the good name of Ruth, it would have rendered it very difficult for him to prosecute her claims in Bethlehem.<sup>5</sup>

But as she is about to go, he bids her first spread out her cloak or shawl, into which he empties six measures of barley,<sup>6</sup> to be carried home to her mother-in-law. What is his intention in this act? That, as he says, she "come not empty to her mother-in-law." A mere sign of his friendly disposition, it cannot have been; for Ruth will tell her all that he has said. He must have had other reasons for not wishing her to go away empty. If notwithstanding every precaution, Ruth was recognized when she returned from the threshing-floor, her appearance, laden with grain, would be less suspicious, than if she were met dressed up as a fine lady. Thus laden, it was usual to see her come from the fields of Boaz. Thus, the last occasion of possible suspicion was cut off. Still, the whole significance of the proceeding is not exhausted with this. Decided stress is laid on the fact that he gave her six measures of barley. When Ruth comes home, and Naomi asks, "Who art thou, my daughter," i. e. "how comest thou? as one whose claim has been acknowledged, or otherwise?" she informs her mother-in-law of all that Boaz said, and expressly adds, what the reader has already been informed of, and what if only the liberality of the giver came into consideration, Naomi could see without being told: "these six measures of barley gave he me." She evidently deems it important that Naomi should know, that he gave her just six measures of grain. The old Jewish expositors have made all sorts of allegorical attempts with this "six." They are undoubtedly so far right, that apart from the friendly custom of sending visitors away enriched with gifts for their families, Boaz, on this occasion, meant to give a hint to Naomi of the result of Ruth's application. This result was, that in any event Ruth would obtain a "resting-place." The number six is the symbol of labor and service, which is followed by seven, the time of rest. Whoever has served six years, is released in the seventh. Naomi receives what she may take as an intimation that the time has come, when after long labor she must let Ruth go out free. The day of rest is at hand.

Ver. 18. And she said, Remain quiet [cf. Gen. xxxviii. 11], my daughter. Ruth is to remain at home, like an affianced bride. From both words

1 "All know that thou art a good woman." The LXX., with singular literalness, render הָיָה לְכָל אִשְׂרָאֵל by הָיָה לְכָל אִשְׂרָאֵל.

2 The Midrash (Ruth Rabba, p. 34 b), which would fain hold fast to the letter of the law, which speaks only of the brother as gōel, thinks that the name of the nearer relative was Tob (cf. ver. 12). As if Boaz had intended to say: "If Tob will redeem thee, let him redeem." But Ibn Ezra already found this unsuitable, and ch. iv. makes it wholly impossible.

3 The Talmud (Berachoth, p. 9 a) teaches how to measure the break of day. The Mishna had decided day-break to begin when it becomes possible to distinguish between white and blue; R. Mai, when a wolf and a dog — R. Akiba, when an ass and a wild ass — could be distinguished. "But others said, when one sees and recognises another person at the distance of four ells."

4 [WAGNER: "These words express Boaz's opinion, which he had previously intimated to Ruth; for the use of the article (the i. e. this woman) forbids us to suppose that they were actually addressed to Ruth. The Targumist, probably influenced by this reason, and considering it unlikely that Boaz should have been alone in the threshing-floor, renders: "and Boaz said to his young men," etc. — Ta.]

5 The Mishna (Jebamoth, li. 8) determined that one suspected of previous intercourse with a foreigner, even though she were a convert, was not allowed to perform the duty of levirate marriage.

6 The measure is not given; the expression is simply: "six of barley." It made a considerable load, for he had to put it on her. The allegorical interpretation of the Midrash (in the Targum) brings out six descendants of Ruth, namely, David, Daniel, "the companions" (Dan. i. 6) and "the king, Mesias." Ruth Rabba, p. 34 a, counts eight descendants with six prominent characteristics. In this case, Hezekiah and Josiah are added to the others already named.

and actions of Boaz, Naomi perceives that he will not rest, until he makes good his promise. This very day will decide the issue of the matter. And whatever that issue may be, it will not be without a blessing. "The man will not rest, until he have provided for thee a resting-place."

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

"And now, my daughter, fear not; I will do to thee all that thou sayest." The faith of Boaz is such as leads to action. He not only instructs, by his prophetic words to Ruth (ch. ii. 12), and by the pious spirit that breathes in his intercourse with his servants; he not only gives, moved by sympathy sprung from faith; he not only enters into the necessities and anxieties of Ruth; but he has also a clean heart, in which no impure thought arises, and stands as firm in the hour of temptation and secrecy as when the eyes of all Bethlehem are upon him. He is an Israelite not only before man, but also before God alone. And it was because he did not forget, what man is naturally so prone to forget, that God sees him, that he is so mindful of his duty. Hypocrites, when alone, are different from what they appear in company; Israelites like Boaz feel and act in the presence of the all-knowing God alone, not otherwise than they would if all the stars of heaven and all the creatures of earth could testify against them. Boaz showed an active faith when he gave no place to temptation. Pious and offenseless as he was when Ruth came to claim the right of the poor, he is equally so now when she asks for her right of redemption. Then the question was only about a few ears of grain, now it involves his own person and estate. Then he was kind in the presence of Ruth's humility, now he is humble in the presence of her claim to be righted. Then he forgot herself in the fact that she had left the land of Moab, now he forgets that she had ever owned another law than that of Israel. Then his tender delicacy made Ruth assured of her safety in his fields; now that same delicacy understands that since she has come to him, the right she claims must be fulfilled. He might have released himself by the letter of the law to which she appeals, — there was a nearer relative; but his faith is an active faith. The question was one of right, not of ingenious play with the letter. The claimant must be satisfied; and he does what he promised to do. Freely and purely, full of that love which is the characteristic of faith, he keeps himself and keeps his word. People speak of a man's "word of honor;" it were more correct to speak of "the word of a Christian," "the word of a confessor of God." For only the Christian does not walk in the crooked ways of intrigue and false advocates.

STARKE: "Christian, behold the kindness and gentleness of Boaz! Will it then be possible that God, when thou art in need, will send thee empty away? Never! his generous hand is never closed. Only open Him thy heart, and divine gifts flow in upon thee, without any action on thy part."

THE SAME: "A Christian must be upright in word and deed."

CHAPTER FOURTH.

The Israelite without Guile.

- 1 Then went Boaz [And Boaz went] up to the gate, and sat him down there: and behold, the kinsman [redeemer] of whom Boaz spake <sup>1</sup> came [passed] by; unto whom he said, Ho, such a one! turn aside, sit down here. And he turned aside, and sat
- 2 down. And he took ten men of the elders of the city, and said, Sit ye down here.
- 3 And they sat down. And he said unto the kinsman [redeemer], Naomi, that is come again out of the country [territory] of Moab, selleth [sold] a parcel of land
- 4 [the field-portion], which was our brother Elimelech's: And I thought to advertise thee [determined to inform thee <sup>2</sup>], saying, Buy it before the inhabitants [the sitters, i. e. those present <sup>3</sup>], and before the elders of my people. If thou wilt redeem it, redeem it; but if thou <sup>4</sup> wilt not redeem it, then tell me, that I may know: for there is none to redeem it besides thee; and I am after thee. And he said, I will redeem it.
- 5 Then said Boaz, What day thou buyest <sup>5</sup> the field of the hand of Naomi, thou must buy [thou buyest] it also of Ruth the Moabitess, the wife of the dead, to raise up
- 6 the name of the dead upon his inheritance. And the kinsman [redeemer] said, I cannot redeem it for myself, lest I mar [injure] mine own inheritance: redeem thou my right [my redemption, i. e. that which it is my right or duty to redeem] to thyself; for I
- 7 cannot redeem it. Now this was the manner [custom] in former time in Israel concerning [in cases of] redeeming and concerning [in cases of ex-] changing, for to confirm all things [every matter]; a man plucked off his shoe, and gave it to his
- 8 neighbour: and this was a [omit: a] testimony <sup>6</sup> in Israel. Therefore [And] the kinsman [redeemer] said unto Boaz, Buy it for thee. So [And] he drew off his

9 shoe. And Boaz said unto the elders, and unto all the people, Ye are witnesses this day, that I have bought all that was Elimelech's, and all that was Chilion's and 10 Mahlon's, of the hand of Naomi. Moreover, Ruth the Moabitess, the wife of Mahlon, have I purchased [acquired]<sup>1</sup> to be my wife, to raise up the name of the dead upon his inheritance, that the name of the dead be not cut off from among his brethren, 11 and from the gate of his place: ye are witnesses this day. And all the people that were in the gate, and the elders, said, We are witnesses. The Lord [Jehovah] make the woman that is come [that cometh] into thine house like Rachel and like Leah, which two did build the house of Israel: and do thou worthily [i.e. make thou 12 strength] in Ephratah and be famous [and get a name] in Beth-lehem: And let thine house be like the house of Pharez [Perets, Perez], whom Tamar bare unto Judah, of the seed which the Lord [Jehovah] shall give thee of this young woman.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

[1 Ver. 1. — Sc. "to Ruth," ch. iii. 12. וְרֹחַל is the accus. after וְיָבֹרַךְ, cf. Gen. xix. 21; xxiii. 16. — On the forms סָבְרָה and שָׂבְרָה, cf. Ges. 48, 5; 72, Rem. 3; 69, 3, 2; on וְיָבֹרַךְ, 72, Rem. 4. — Ta.]

[2 Ver. 4. — Lit. "And I said, I will uncover thine ear," i. e. I determined to inform thee. וְאֶמְרָתִי is the same in sense as the fuller וְאֶמְרָתִי בְלִבִּי, Gen. xvii. 17, etc., cf. Ex. ii. 14, etc. It might be supposed to refer to what Boaz said to Ruth, ch. iii. 12 f.; but as Ruth is not spoken of until the next verse, this is less likely. The expression "to uncover the ear," originated in the practice of removing the hair that hangs over the ear, for the purpose of whispering a secret to a person. In general it means to communicate anything confidentially, but is here used in the wider sense of imparting information. The suffix of the second per. in וְאֶמְרָתִי is perhaps best explained by regarding the whole clause after וְאֶמְרָתִי as mentally uttered by Boaz, while considering how to proceed in the matter of Ruth. In this consideration, the nearer kinsman was present to his mind, and to him he addressed the conclusion, which he now only rehearses, "I will inform thee," etc. — Ta.]

[3 Ver. 4. — So Dr. Cassel. Kell: "Many translate וְהַיִּשְׁבִּי by 'inhabitants,' sc. those of Bethlehem. But although according to ver. 9, a goodly number of the people, besides the elders, were present, this can scarcely be conceived to have been the case with the inhabitants of Bethlehem generally, so as to meet the requirement of וְהַיִּשְׁבִּי. Nor would the inhabitants have been named before, but as in ver. 9, after, the elders as principal witnesses [but cf. ver. 11]. For these reasons וְהַיִּשְׁבִּי is to be taken in the sense 'to sit,' and וְהַיִּשְׁבִּי is to be understood of the same persons who form the subject of וְהַיִּשְׁבִּי in ver. 2, the elders. The following וְהַיִּשְׁבִּי is to be taken explicatively: before those who sit here, even before the elders of my people." — Ta.]

[4 Ver. 4. — The Text. Recept. reads וְהַיִּשְׁבִּי, third per., concerning which Kell remarks, that "it strikes one as singular, since one expects the second person, וְהַיִּשְׁבִּי, which is not only read by the LXX., but also by a number of MSS., and seems to be required by the context. It is true, the common reading may (with Sebastian Schmidt, Carpsov, and others) be defended, by assuming that in uttering this word Boaz turned to the elders, and so spoke of the redeemer as of a third person: 'if he, the redeemer here, will not redeem;' but as this is immediately followed by a resumption of the direct address, this supposition — to our mind at least — seems very artificial." — The substitution by the Keri of וְהַיִּשְׁבִּי for וְהַיִּשְׁבִּי is not necessary, cf. Ges. 127, 8 b. — Ta.]

[5 Ver. 5. — וְהַיִּשְׁבִּי. Kell: "According to sense and connection, this form must be the second per. masc.; the ו at the end was either added by a slip of the pen, or it arose from an original ו, so that we must read either וְהַיִּשְׁבִּי (with the Keri) without an accusative, or, with an accusative, וְהַיִּשְׁבִּי, 'thou buyest it.' — Ta.]

[6 Ver. 7. — וְהַיִּשְׁבִּי. Gesenius and Fürst define this word here as "custom having the force of law," "attested usage." Dr. Cassel's rendering, Weisthum, is probably intended to convey the same idea (cf. Hoffmann's Wörterb.). But it seems better to take the word here in its proper sense of "attestation," as in E. V. So the ancient versions, Bertheau, Kell, etc. Cf. the root וְהַיִּשְׁבִּי. — Ta.]

[7 Ver. 10. — The Heb. וְהַיִּשְׁבִּי is less specific than our word "purchase." It means to obtain, to acquire; which may be done in a variety of ways. The rendering "purchased" is unfortunate in this particular case, as it tends to convey the erroneous idea that Ruth was treated as a chattel, or at least as a sort of adscripta gleba. The same word is used also in vers. 4, 5, and 9, where there is no particular objection to represent it in English by "buy," although "acquire" would be preferable for the sake of uniformity. — Ta.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Ver. 1. And Boaz went up to the gate, and seated himself there. Very early, even before Ruth with her burden of barley had yet started for home (ch. iii. 15), Boaz, energetic in deed as he was kind in word, took the way to Bethlehem. It was necessary to set out so early, in order to be sure of reaching the gate before the person with whom he wished to speak, and who like himself was probably in the habit of coming to the city from the country. The gate, it is well known, was the place where judicial business was transacted and markets were held (Deut. xxi. 19 ff.; cf. Ps.

cxvii. 5). This is still the case in the East. In Zach. viii. 16, the prophet says: "Judge truth and the judgment of peace in your gates;" on which Jerome (ed. Migne, vi. p. 1474) remarks: "It is asked, why among the Jews the gate was the place for administering justice. The judges sat in the gates that the country-people might not be compelled to enter the cities and suffer detriment. Sitting there, they could hear the townsmen and country-people as they left or entered the city; and each man, his business finished, could return at once to his own house." At the gate was the proper forum; and it is certainly more satisfactory than all other explanations of the Latin word, to derive it, notwithstanding the later central situation of the place to which it was applied, from the archaic fora, gate, whence foras, cf. biforis, septiforis.

Certain Some-one, come and seat thyself. We have here the whole course of an ancient legal procedure before us, with its usages and forms. The fact that Boaz sat at the gate, plainly declared that he sought a judicial decision. When the person for whom he waited made his appearance, he made no delay to seat himself as requested, for the language addressed to him was a formal judicial summons. His name is not mentioned. Peloni almoni is a formula like our German N. N. [used as in English we now generally use a simple — or "blank." — Ta.] In former times, it was customary among us, in legal documents, to use in the same way names that were very common, such as Hans, etc. (cf. my Erf. Bilder u. Bräuche, p. 29). The underlying idea of Peloni almoni is a different one from that of Seiva (cf. Matth. xxvi. 18) or quidam. It intimates that the name is unknown and hidden. It conveys the idea of anonymus, in every sense of the word. There is an ancient explanation to the effect that the name of the first goel is not given, because he was unwilling to raise up a name for his deceased relative. This is the reason, probably, why the LXX. here have κρυπτός, "hidden one." Without maintaining this, but even supposing that the narrator omitted the name merely because he did not know it, it remains none the less an instructive fact that he who was so anxious for the preservation of his own inheritance, is now not even known by name.

Ver. 2. He took ten men of the elders of the city. That the number of elders in any city was not necessarily limited to ten, may be inferred from Judg. viii. 14; but ten were sufficient to form a college of witnesses. In post-biblical times it was a maxim that an assembly for religious worship (קהל, "congregation"), must consist of ten persons (cf. the Jerus. Targum on Ex. xii. 4); but the attempt of the Mishna (Sanhedrin, i. 6) to ground this biblically on the supposed fact that the ten faithless spies are spoken of as a congregation (Num. xiv. 27), can hardly be deemed satisfactory. The custom, however, of selecting exactly ten men for such service as was here required, was so old and well-established among the Jews, that the term עשר, "number," by itself, meant ten persons.

1 עשר. It is only necessary to refer to the Commentaries of Bertheau and Keil, to perceive in what respects I have deemed it needful to depart from their expositions of this passage. Benary (de Hæretorum Levitatu, Berlin, 1886, p. 23 ff.), following Jewish example, has made Boaz a nephew, and the Peloni a brother, of Elimelech. But no great stress is to be laid on this tradition. עשר, brother, as our passage itself shows, is often used where the relationship is more distant than that which exists between Others, it is true, as we learn further on, had assembled about the two relatives; but the ten elders formed, so to speak, the necessary official witnesses.

Ver. 3. The inheritance of our brother<sup>1</sup> Elimelech, Naomi has sold. The expositors, with one consent, demand by what right Naomi could sell the inheritance of Elimelech, since the Mosaic law contains nothing to indicate that it considered the widow as the rightful heir of her deceased husband. But this view of the law is incorrect.<sup>2</sup> The whole system of levitical marriage presupposes that the title of the deceased husband's property vests in the widow. When a man dies childless, leaving a widow, the brother of the deceased is to marry her, in order "that the first-born may enter upon the name of the dead," i. e. that the name of the dead may continue to be connected with the inheritance which he has left behind, for in no other sense can the expression "to raise up the name of one" have any meaning in Israel; and, accordingly, in ver. 5 the words of the law, "to raise up the name of the dead," are supplemented by the addition, "upon his inheritance." But in case the brother-in-law refused to marry the widow, and consequently refused to raise up the name of his brother, he thereby also gave up all right to enter on the inheritance of his brother. The duty and the right were indissolubly connected. The law would have been illusory, if the brother, notwithstanding his refusal to marry the widow, had obtained the inheritance. In that case, possession remained with the widow, who, albeit childless, carried within herself, so to speak, the embryonic right of the heir. Of the symbolical act of drawing off the shoe, we shall speak farther on. But it is to be noted here that when the widow drew off the shoe of the recusant brother-in-law, she thereby declared that he must withdraw his foot from the possessions of his brother.

Naomi was a widow. But although she herself says (ch. i. 12) that she is too old to become a wife, even this fact gives no right to her property to any blood-relative, without marriage. Undoubtedly, the name of her husband would vanish from his estate as soon as she died; but until then it remained upon it, and Naomi had the same right and power to dispose of the property as the law gave to the husband himself. Now, in Lev. xxv. 25, we read: "If thy brother become impoverished and sell his possession, let his nearest blood-relative (יְקָרָב הַקָּרִיב) come to him, and redeem that which his brother sold." This contingency was here actually come to pass. Naomi had become impoverished, — she had sold. The name of Elimelech was still on the property: consequently the law demanded its redemption, and directed this demand to the nearest blood-relative. It is on the basis of this prescription, that Boaz begins his negotiation with the unnamed kinsman, in the interest of Naomi.

The sale of the land had hitherto not been mentioned. Nothing was said about it in the conversation between Ruth and Boaz on the threshing-floor. The fact that Boaz knew of it, confirms the sons of the same parent. Blood-relatives, and even friends, are also "brothers." The very law, by which the usage now under consideration is sanctioned, uses the term in a wider sense, Deut. xxv. 5 (cf. Hengst. Pentateuch, ii. 83 ff., Ryland's ed.).

surmise that before Ruth came to him with her great request, he and Naomi had already had some communication with each other. These communications, having reference to the sale of the land, and the necessity of its redemption according to law, may be regarded as having ultimately led to the proposition made by Naomi in ch. iii. 1. Naomi advanced from the redemption of the land to that of the widow, just as Boaz does here in his negotiation with the nearer kinsman.

Ver. 4. Buy it before these who sit here, and before the elders of my people. Boaz had said to Ruth, that he would ask the nearest kinsman whether he "will redeem thee; and if not, then will I redeem thee." But this is not the way in which he opens his address to the man. He does not mention the name of Ruth at first. He desires of him apparently only the redemption of the land. This testifies to the uncommon delicacy of legal proceedings at that time, as conducted by pious and believing persons. The cause is entirely saved from appearing as if Boaz had begun it only in behalf of the woman. Nor does Boaz put the nearer kinsman under any constraint; for he says at once: "If thou wilt not redeem it, then will I, for I come next." He admonishes the other of the duty imposed on him by the law, by the recognition of his own; while, on the other hand, he facilitates the other's decision, by intimating his readiness to render the service demanded, if the other should prefer to be excused. He says nothing of Ruth's connection with the matter. He leaves it to the kinsman himself to take the open and generally known relations between Naomi and Ruth into consideration, and to shape his answer accordingly. His address is gentle, noble, and discreet. It brings no complaint that the kinsman as nearest relative has not troubled himself about the matter in hand. It asks nothing of the other, that he is not willing to do himself. It is sufficiently discreet to wait and see how far the other will limit his duty. And withal, the interest and decision with which he urges the matter to a conclusion, make the transaction a forcible example to the people, teaching them to make the law a living spirit, and openly to acknowledge the duties which it imposes.

And he said, I will redeem. The kinsman, therefore, acknowledges the right of Naomi to sell, and also his own duty to redeem. But he thinks only of the land. He answers the question of Boaz only according to the literal import of its terms. By saying, "I will redeem," he declares his readiness to buy back the land left by Elimelech, but his words do not indicate whether he is conscious of the further duties therewith connected. Boaz may have expected that he would make further inquiry concerning them; but as he did not do this, Boaz could not rest contented with the brief reply, "I will redeem," seeing that he was chiefly solicitous about the future of Ruth, and that the duty to redeem not only the land but also the widow must be expressly acknowledged before all who were present. Hence he says farther:

Ver. 5. In the day that thou buyest the field of Naomi, thou buyest it also of Ruth the Moabitess, . . . to raise up the name of the dead upon his inheritance. With these words, the law of entailment as recognized in Israel, becomes perfectly clear. Elimelech had left sons, who, had they lived, would have been the proper heirs. But they died. Now, if Ruth had not come from Moab with Naomi, Naomi would have been the sole possessor of the land. Having no means to cultivate it, she could have sold it, and the blood-relative could have bought it back without taking upon himself levirate duties, since her age rendered it improbable that they would answer the purpose for which they were instituted. But Ruth did come; and having entered into the Israelitish community, she also possesses Israelitish rights. She is, consequently, the heiress of Mahlon; and no one can redeem her inheritance, without at the same time providing for the continuance of the name of the dead. In her case, considerations like those which applied to Naomi, have no existence. Her husband Mahlon, whether he were the younger or the older brother, was an heir. Since Orpah remained in Moab, the claims of Chilion as heir, were also transferred to the estate of his brother. Separate possessions of their own, the sons of Elimelech probably had not, as long as they lived in Israel. Consequently, the land was the joint possession of Naomi and Ruth. And just because Ruth was part proprietress, the obligation existed not to let the names of Elimelech and Mahlon perish. The inheritance alone could not, therefore, be redeemed, as the anonymous relative proposed to do.

Ver. 6. And the redeemer said, I cannot redeem it for myself, lest I injure mine own inheritance. Thus far the kinsman has accurately acknowledged his duty as prescribed by the Mosaic law. He is ready to redeem the land. Nor does he challenge the right of Ruth, as wife of the deceased Mahlon. Why then does he think that the performance of levirate duty to her will damage his own inheritance? For although accepted even by the most recent expositors, the idea that he is influenced by the thought that the land which he is to buy with his own money will one day belong not to himself, but to his son by Ruth, has no great probability. There is something forced in an exegesis that makes a father regard it as a personal detriment and injury when his own son enters upon an inheritance. Nor could the kinsman justify himself with a ground so external, before the assembly present. No; as he has hitherto not failed to honor the requirements of the law, it is to be assumed that he deems his present refusal also to be not in contravention of its provisions. Boaz here expressly speaks of Ruth as the "Moabitess." It must be her Moabitish nationality that forms the ground, such as it is, of the kinsman's refusal. Elimelech's misfortunes had been popularly ascribed to his emigration to Moab; the death of Chilion and Mahlon to their marriage with Moabitish women. This it was that had endangered their inheritance. The goel fears a similar fate.<sup>1</sup> He thinks that he ought not to take into his house a woman, marriage with whom has already been visited with the extinguishment of a family in Israel. To him, the law against intermarriage with Moabites, does not appear to be suspended in favor of Ruth. He is unwilling to endanger his own family and inheritance; and as Ruth is a Moabitess, he holds it possible to decline what in any other case he would deem an imperative duty.

The man appears to be superstitious, and devoted to the letter of the law. He sees only its formal decisions, not the love that animates it. He fears; but love knows no fear. From anxious refers, come no nearer to it. Cf. Seiden, Uzor Hebrews, lib. 1. cap. 9.

<sup>1</sup> This view of the reason of the refusal is also indicated by the Midrash (Ruth Rabba, 35a). Le Clerc is very far from the right understanding. Other opinions, to which he regard to the lower, he overlooks the higher duty. He thinks of Moab; whereas Ruth has taken refuge under the wings of the God of Israel. He does not comprehend the difference of the conditions under which Mahlon once married her, and those under which he is now called upon to act toward her. He knows not how to distinguish times and spirits. The legal severity which he would bring to bear on the noble woman, recoils on himself. He is unwilling to endanger his name and inheritance, and — history does not even know his name. While the guilt of Elimelech and his sons is removed through the love of Ruth, so that their name survives, his lovelessness toward Ruth is visited by namelessness.<sup>1</sup> What a priceless lesson is hereby taught! What an honor does it award to love, and what a punishment does it hold out to the superstitious Pharisee!

Ver. 7 f. Formerly,<sup>2</sup> in cases of redemption and exchange, a man pulled off his shoe and gave it to the other. The symbolism of the shoe, as it existed in Israel and among other nations, has been so wretchedly misunderstood and perverted, especially in the books of a man whose distorted and dishonest compilations will be injurious to many (Nork's Mythol. der Volkssagen, p. 459, etc.), that it will be worth the trouble to explain it, at least in outline.

The shoe is the symbol, first, of motion and wandering; secondly, of rest and possession. The following may serve to illustrate the first of these significations: When Israel is directed to eat the Passover in a state of readiness for instant departure, among other specific injunctions, is this: "your shoes on your feet" (Ex. xii. 11). With reference to the wanderings through the desert, it is said: "thy shoe did not grow old" (Deut. xxix. 4 (5)), etc.<sup>3</sup> The wanderings of the gods form a singular feature of the old heathenism, in its search after God. The fact of their passage was often supposed to be attested by the footprints they left behind; but in Chemmis in Egypt, a blessing ensued (as Herodotus tells us, ii. 91) whenever the gigantic shoe of Perseus was seen. It was not the shoe, but the god, who brought the blessing. Heathendom, especially Germanic heathendom, continued to search and wander even after death. The dead, when buried, were provided with an helskó, or shoe, for the journey they had to make (Grimm, Myth. 795). Even until comparatively recent times, there were popular legends concerning deceased persons who lament that they received no shoe (Stöber, Elsassische Sagen, p. 34). In certain districts, any last token of respect shown the dead is, perhaps to this very day, called "the dead-man's shoe." The sorrowful idea expressed in the practice was that the dead must be helped on in his last journey. Simrock's explanation concerning good works is entirely erroneous (Myth. 154). The passage of Pope Gregory on Ex. xii. 11, means something altogether different. Gregory intends there to refer to the example of pious persons who have gone before. The Christian Church opposed; rather than favored, the heathen usage.

<sup>2</sup> שָׁפָרָה. Formerly it was customary to pull off the shoe on every occasion of exchange or barter; now, i. e. at the time when the writer of our Book lived, it was done only in the special case contemplated in Deut. xxv. 7 ff., and then it was removed not by the man himself, but by the

Of cognate and yet very different signification are certain passages of the Talmud and the Midrash (Jerus. Talmud, Kelajim, § 9, p. 23, b; Midrash Rabba, § 100, p. 88 a), where the aged teacher desires that when he is buried sandals may be fastened to his feet, in order that he may be able to follow after the Messiah as soon as He comes.

Luther gave utterance to the saying: "Tie a pair of sandals to his door, and let them be called 'Surge et ambula.'" Hence also the still current popular superstition of throwing the shoe on New Year's day, the alighting of which with its toe pointing outward, is considered to be indicative of departure (cf. my Weihnachten, p. 273).

The shoe was the symbol, secondly, of rest and possession. With the shoe one trod the earth, whence on holy ground it must be pulled off; over it, one had complete control, and hence it symbolized the power of the possessor over his possession. In the Psalms (lx. 10 (8); cviii. 10 (9)), God casts his shoe over Edom. Rosenmüller (Morgenland, n. 483) has already directed attention to the practice of the Abyssinian Emperor, who throws his shoe over that which he desires to have. That which in ecclesiastical architecture is called Marienschuh<sup>4</sup> points to nothing else than the dominion ascribed by the mediæval church to the mother of God. The custom of kissing the pope's slipper, likewise refers to his dominion. The idea of the old Scandinavian legend, according to which, at the last day the wolf finally submits to Widar, who sets his shoe upon him, is that of the victory of the new earth over the old wicked enemy.

The shoe symbolized a possession which one actually had, and could tread with his feet, at pleasure. Whoever entered into this possession conjointly with another, put his foot into the same shoe, as in old German law was done by an adopted child and the wife (Grimm, Rechtsalterth. p. 155). Hence, when in our passage the goel pulled off his shoe and gave it to Boaz, he therewith surrendered to him all claims to the right of possession which would have been his had he fulfilled its conditions. Nor has that use of the shoe, of which the law speaks, in connection with the levitical institute, any different meaning. The widow, whose brother-in-law refuses to marry her, is authorized to pull off his shoe, and to spit in his face. His house, henceforth, is "the house of him that hath had his shoe pulled off." Had he performed his duty, he would have set his shoe upon the inheritance of his brother (including wife and estate) as his own. But having contemned this, he undergoes the shame of having his shoe drawn off by the widow. The shame of this consisted in the fact that he must submit to it at the hands of the woman. A man might pull off his own shoe, and hand it to another, without suffering degradation. This was done in every instance of exchange. It was but the exercise of his manly right. But when the shoe was taken from him, he was, as it were, declared destitute of every capacity and right toward the widow symbolized by the shoe, and in this consisted the disgrace.

Now, although in our passage, strictly speaking, woman. The present case does not fall under the latter head (Cf. the Introd. p. 8).

<sup>3</sup> [Wordsworth: The returning prodigal in the gospel has shoes put on his feet (Luke xv. 22): he is reinstated in the lost inheritance. We, when reconciled to God in Christ, have our "feet shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace" (Eph. vi. 15). — Tr.]

a similar case to that contemplated by the law in Deut. xxv. 7 ff. occurs—for the kinsman refuses to marry Ruth—yet the ceremony of the kinsman's delivering his shoe to Boaz was significant only of his simple, voluntary renunciation of his rights. On the one hand, Ruth was not his sister-in-law; and although custom, in accordance with the spirit of the Mosaic law, acknowledged the duty even in cases of more distant relationship, the letter of the law did not reach him. On the other hand,—and this was undoubtedly a point of real weight,—his refusal to marry Ruth was itself based on regard for the law, albeit narrow and unspiritual; for from his readiness to redeem the land, it is but fair to infer that he would have been equally ready to do his duty by her, had she been an Israelitess. Inasmuch, therefore, as he thinks it possible to separate the redemption of the land from that of the woman, he comes off more honorably than would under ordinary circumstances have been the case. His language refers explicitly only to the estate, which had the effect of lessening the dishonor done to Ruth, especially as Boaz declares himself ready to take his place. Finally, according to ch. iii. 18, Ruth was not present at the negotiation, the representation of Josephus to the contrary notwithstanding.<sup>1</sup>

Ver. 9 f. And Boaz said, Ye are witnesses this day that I have acquired (do acquire), etc. The kinsman having drawn off his shoe, in token of his renunciation of his rights as nearest goel, Boaz arose, and declared, fully and formally, that he acquires everything that belonged to Elimelech, and (as is now expressed at full length) everything that belonged to Chilion and Mahlon. He acquires it from Naomi; but as he cannot acquire it without also marrying the wife of Mahlon, as Ruth is here for the first time called,—for which reason he made special mention of the possession of the sons,—he adds that he takes her “to raise up the name of the dead upon his inheritance, in order that his name be not cut off from among his brethren, and from the gate of his place.” In these words, he thoroughly, albeit indirectly, refuted the motive by which the anonymous kinsman was actuated in his refusal. When the name of a brother is to be rescued from oblivion among his own people, all scruples vanish. The fulfillment of a duty so pious, lifts a man up beyond the reach of fear. Boaz apprehends no damage to his own inheritance; but hopes rather, while taking Ruth under his wings, to repair the evil which the migration to Moab has inflicted upon the house of Elimelech. This pious magnanimity, this humble acceptance of duty, this readiness to act where the nearer kinsman hesitates, and this true insight of faith, which looked not at the birthplace of Ruth, but at what she had done for Israel and now was in Israel, and thus dissolved all superstitious fear in the divine wisdom of love, win for him also the approbation of all present. The public voice spoke well of Ruth; all knew how loving, virtuous, and self-sacrificing she was (cf. ch. ii. 11; iii. 11). Hence, not only the elders who had been summoned as witnesses, but also all the people, unitedly invoked the blessing of God upon him.

Ver. 11. Jehovah make the woman that cometh into thy house, like Rachel and Leah, which two did build the house of Israel. From Rachel and Leah came the tribes of Israel. As these built the house of Jacob, so, say the people, may Ruth build thy house. The extent of the general delight, may be measured by the fact that it wishes for Ruth the Moabitess a blessing equal to that of the wives of Jacob who were Israelitesses. The Jewish expositors point out that Rachel stands before Leah, although younger and less blessed with children, and although the tribe of Judah, and Bethlehem with it, descended from Leah. It is probable that the whole sentence was already at that time, the usual formula of blessing in Israelitish marriages. However that may be, the traditions of Israel made Rachel more prominent than Leah. Rachel was Jacob's first and best beloved. Rachel took away her father's idol images. As she suffered many sorrows up to her death, so the prophet represents her as weeping bitterly after death for her children (Jer. xxxi. 15; Matth. ii. 18). It was Rachel, too, who after she had been long unfruitful, as Ruth in Moab, had brought forth most of those sons in whom Jacob was most highly blessed. But the people desire not merely that many children may adorn her house; they proceed: יְצַו וְיַלְד, may she make, produce, strength, ability, heroism.<sup>2</sup> They wish that sons may be born, who, like Boaz, shall be heroes of strength (cf. ch. ii. 1), so that “great names” may proceed out of Bethlehem.<sup>3</sup> The blessing was most abundantly fulfilled.

Ver. 12. And be thy house like the house of Perez. After the general comes the special wish, which in this instance is of peculiar importance. Boaz was descended from Perez, and Perez was the son of Tamar. Now, although the history of Tamar (Gen. xxxviii.) is not as pure as that of Ruth, it yet contained features which might have served as precedents to Boaz. Tamar's first two husbands had died on account of their sins, and Judah, their father, would not give her the third, “lest he also die as his brethren.” This was the same motive as that which must have influenced the nearer kinsman. The very fact that he had this history before him, confirms the conclusion we have already reached concerning the grounds of his refusal. Tamar suffered injustice, her right being withheld from her. The same thing happened to Ruth. No one thought of her rights, until she laid claim to them. Tamar did the same, albeit not in the pure and graceful manner adopted by Ruth. Nevertheless, Judah, when he found himself outwitted by her, said: “She is more righteous than I,” thus acknowledging his injustice. Boaz had not been guilty of any such injustice; but he felt it his duty, in behalf of the members of his family, to see that that which had hitherto been neglected was neglected no longer. His proceeding involved an admission that Ruth had not received what was her rightful due in Israel. The confession of injustice draws after it a blessing; especially here in the case of Boaz, whose kind and noble conduct is beyond all praise.

<sup>3</sup> These great names, as sprung from Boaz, would of course redound to his honor. To be nameless was to be shameful, as is illustrated in the Peloni. The Greeks also used ἀνώνυμος as the opposite of κλέος, i. e. in the sense of nameless, like שָׁמַיִם. Cf. Schleussner, Lex. on the LXX., i. 315.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

"Ye are witnesses this day that I take Ruth the Moabitess to be my wife." What a noble pair confront each other in the persons of Ruth and Boaz! They are types for all times of the mutual relations of man and woman. The remark of Pascal, that the Old Testament contains the images of future joy, is here especially applicable. Ruth acts to the utmost of her power out of love: Boaz is a man of unfeigned faith. Ruth takes voluntary duties upon herself from love to Naomi: Boaz meets these duties in the spirit of obedience to the commands of God. Ruth, moved by love, dares to risk the delicate reserve of woman; and Boaz offsets her deed by a delicacy of faith which would comply, if it were but to avoid wounding, and gives all, in order to satisfy. He promises everything, if only he may relieve Ruth from fear. Ruth followed into poverty from love; and Boaz, though rich, regards only the duty prescribed by faith. Ruth was ignorant of the prejudices that stood in her way; Boaz knew and overcame them. Ruth thought she had a right to claim; Boaz was under no obligation, and yet acted. The nearest redeemer retreated, most probably because Ruth was a Moabitess; Boaz says, "Ye are witnesses that I take the Moabitess to wife." An ancient church-father says: "Boaz, in accordance with the meritoriousness of his faith received Ruth for his wife, in order that from so sanctified a marriage a royal race might be born. For Boaz, well advanced in years, received his wife, not for himself, but for God; not to fulfill the desires of the flesh, but to fulfill the righteousness of the law, in order to raise up a seed for his relative. He was inflamed more by conscience than by passion; he was old by years, but youthful by faith, — and for this perhaps he was called, Boaz — 'in him is virtue.'"

VERSES 13-22.

The Completion of the Blessing.

- 13 So Boaz took Ruth, and she was [became] his wife: and when [omit: when] he went in unto her, [and] the Lord [Jehovah] gave her conception, and she bare a 14 son. And the women said unto Naomi, Blessed be the Lord [Jehovah], which hath not left thee this day without a kinsman [redeemer], that his name may be [and may 15 his name be] famous in Israel. And he shall [may he] be unto thee a restorer of thy life [soul], and a nourisher [support]<sup>1</sup> of thine old age: for thy daughter-in-law.
 16 which loveth thee, which is better to thee than seven sons, hath borne him. And 17 Naomi took the child, and laid it in her bosom, and became nurse unto it. And the women her neighbors gave it a name, saying, There is a son born to Naomi; and they called his name Obed: he is the father of Jesse, the father of David.
 18, 19 Now these are the generations of Pharez: Pharez begat Hezron, and Hezron 20 begat Ram, and Ram begat Aminadab, and Aminadab begat Nahshon, and 21 Nahshon begat Salmon [Salmah],<sup>2</sup> and Salmon begat Boaz, and Boaz begat 22 Obed, and Obed begat Jesse, and Jesse begat David.

[1 Ver. 15. — Lit. "and may he support thine old age." On the form of  $\text{וְיִשְׁעֶנָּה}$  (from  $\text{שָׁעַן}$ ), cf. Gen. 55, 4; on its construction after  $\text{וְיִשְׁעֶנָּה}$ , which here however has the force of the jussive (optative) through its connection with the preceding verb, Gen. 182, 3, Rem. 1. — On the forms  $\text{וְיִשְׁעֶנָּה}$  and  $\text{וְיִשְׁעֶנָּה}$ , cf. Gen. 59, Rem. 3. — Tr.]

[2 Ver. 20. — Salmah ( $\text{שַׁלְמָה}$  or  $\text{שַׁלְמָה}$ , 1 Chron. II. 11) appears in ver. 21 as Salmon, which many MSS. read here also. Originally, the name was probably used indiscriminately either with the termination  $\text{-וֹ}$  or  $\text{-י}$  cf. Gen. 84, 15). By detraction of the  $\text{וֹ}$ ,  $\text{שַׁלְמָה}$  became  $\text{שַׁלְמָה}$ . — Tr.]

EXEGETICAL AND DOCTRINAL.

Ver. 13. And she brought forth a son. With this happy event the last shadows disappear from the checkered lives of the two women. The fears of superstition are shown to have been groundless. Sorrow in Moab has been changed into happiness in Israel. The reward of love has begun, and Jehovah mercifully owns the daughter of Moab, who has left home and native land for his people's sake. Great are the joys which surround the cradle of the child of such parents as Boaz and Ruth. The father of Nero is said to have made the terrible exclamation: "What shall come of a son who has me for his father and Agrippina for his mother!" But here, where love had been married to piety, humility to heroism, innocence to believing insight, everybody must look for a future of blessings. A child of Ruth and Boaz had no need of goddesses and fairies to come to its cradle, in order, according to popular legends, to bring wealth and good wishes. The blessing of the Almighty God, who looks not at the person, but at the heart, has spread out its wings over the child.

Ver. 14. And the women said unto Naomi. What a difference between the beginning and the end of Naomi's life in Israel since her return! When she came back, poor and lonely, where were the women and neighbors, who ought to have comforted, supported, and stood by her in her necessity? Nothing is heard of them. Nobody was with her but Ruth. But now they appear with their good wishes for Naomi and praises to God; for adversity has vanished. Ruth is no longer the poor gleaner, who painfully gathers a living for her mother, but the happy wife of Boaz. A new name has been raised up for the inheritance of Elimelech.

Who hath not left a redeemer to be wanting to thee this day. It is one of the peculiar beauties of our narrative that its last words are almost wholly devoted to Naomi (vers. 14-18). And justly so; for it was Naomi who by her exemplary life in Moab had been the instructress of Ruth. For her sake, the noble woman had come to Israel. Upon her, affliction had fallen most severely (ch. i. 13), bereaving her of both husband and children. Against her, the hand of Jehovah had gone forth, so that she bade acquaintances to call her, not Naomi, but Mara. Moreover, a heart-union existed between herself and Ruth, such as is not often to be found between even natural mother and daughter. The happiness of Ruth would have been her happiness also, even if no national usages and habits had come in to make it such. How tender and delicate is the feeling which these usages and habits set forth, of the sacred and indissoluble character of the marriage bond. And yet modern self-conceit—that, and not Christian self-knowledge—perpetually talks of the inferiority of woman's position under the old covenant! Boaz had married Ruth, as a blood-relative of her former husband, in order to raise up the name of the latter upon his inheritance. The childless widow did not, as happens so often among us, leave the family of her deceased husband, as if she had never become a member of it. The blood-relative obtains a son by her, and the birth of this son becomes an occasion for congratulations to the mother of the former husband. The child borne by Ruth to Boaz as a blood-relative, although not the nearest, of Naomi's husband, is called by the women the goel of Naomi, and they praise God that he has not left Naomi without him. There is, no doubt, a legal ground for this. For the child inherits the estate of Elimelech, because its mother was formerly the wife of his son, and with this estate the life of Naomi also is connected. Not Boaz, who has redeemed the inheritance, but the child for whom he redeemed it, is the real goel of Naomi—the person, that is, in whom her sinking house again raises itself; for he is the son of her son's wife, albeit by another husband. He is the grandson of her family, though not of her blood. Ruth's goel was Boaz, but Naomi's the son of Ruth; for Ruth lives in the house of Boaz, but Naomi in that of the child, which belongs to him by virtue of his birth from Ruth. These are practical definitions of the levitical law; but how thoroughly moral the views on which they rest! how close the sympathy and brotherhood they seek to establish, and how indissoluble the marriage covenant which they presuppose!

Undoubtedly, the most moral law can become torpid, and receive only an external fulfillment or even be evaded. Laws are living and active among a people only so long as the spirit that gave them being continues to live. The conduct of the unknown blood-relative has sufficiently shown, that the law alone could have afforded no help to Ruth and Naomi. The whole history of Naomi in Israel, after her return from Moab and up to the intervention of Boaz, testifies to the inability of the letter of the law to avert misery and distress. Boaz followed, not the letter of the law, but its spirit; and hence did more than the letter demanded. In the persons of those with whom our narrative is mainly concerned, the doctrine verifies itself that there is no law so strong as the law of love. It is this doctrine which the women also have come to recognize when they say to Naomi:—

Ver. 15. For thy daughter-in-law, who loveth thee, and who is better to thee than seven sons, hath borne him. The child, say the women, shall refresh thy soul,—the soul נַפְשִׁי, animus, of Naomi was bowed down with sorrow, the child will restore (יְשַׁלֵּם) her courage,—and support thy old age; and this, they add, not because the law makes him heir to the estate of his mother's family, but because Ruth has borne him. The revivification of Naomi's happiness through the birth of this child, was more securely guaranteed by the love of Ruth, than by friendship and blood-relationship. True, Naomi herself is childless; but seven sons could not have done for her what Ruth did. The women acknowledge now how far short the legal friendship of Israel towards Naomi has fallen, in comparison with the self-sacrifice of the daughter of Moab. And thus there comes to view here so much the more plainly, the doctrine—in its higher sense prophetic, under the old covenant—that love, living, active, self-forgetful, self-sacrificing love, transcends all law and family considerations. Christ announces the same doctrine in its highest form, when he says: "Whosoever shall do the will of my Father which is in heaven, the same is my brother, and sister, and mother" (Matt. xii. 50). Ruth's love for Naomi takes the place of physical descent. It engrafts her child, as it were, into the heart of Naomi. In itself the child is only the grandson of her family and estate; on account of Ruth's love, it becomes to her a veritable grandchild of love, nearer to her heart than if a daughter of her own had given birth to it. The power of pure and self-forgetful love, such as Ruth had entertained, could not be more beautifully delineated.

Ver. 16. And she became foster-mother to it. She took it into her lap, like an actual grandmother. She formed the child in Israelitish life and customs. She became to it what Mordecai was to Esther, an instructress in the law and Israelitish culture. The son of Ruth became to her an actual grandchild of love. For this reason the female neighbors give him a name whose signification is equivalent to Naomi's son.

Ver. 17. They called his name, Obed. There are several noteworthy points connected with this. The female neighbors, in order to give pleasure to Naomi, give the child a name. But beside this, he doubtless received a name from his parents, probably one that belonged to the family. But that given by the women continued to be his usual name, and by it he was inserted into the family genealogy. Consequently, the idea enunciated in it must have been specially characteristic. The text says: "They gave him a name, namely, a son is born to Naomi;" and hence they called him Obed. Now, whether the name Obed be explained as servant of God or servant of Naomi, the sense in either case remains insipid.<sup>1</sup> What the women mean is, not that the child is the servant of Naomi, but that he is to her as a son.<sup>2</sup> If the words of ver. 17 are to have a plain sense; nay, if the preservation of just that name which the female neighbors gave him is to have an explanation, the name Obed must in some way express the idea of the word "son." For in this name "son," given with reference to Naomi, there is contained the idea that the sin which lay at the base of her evil fortune had been atoned for. She who lost the children of her own body, had now a son in the spirit of true love. It is true, that from the philological stores extant in the Bible, the explanation of Obed in the sense of "son" is not possible; but it may be done by the assistance of other languages. It is sufficiently clear that Obed is to be connected with the Greek παῖδρος (paîs, paîdros), Latin putus, Sanskrit pûta, putra, Persian puser.<sup>3</sup>

The circumstance that Obed was used in the sense of "son," justifies the conjecture that in the Hebrew of that day there were various foreign words in use, probably introduced through Aramaic influences, without postulating a closer contact of the so-called Semitic with the Indo-germanic tongues than is usually assumed.

He is the father of Jesse, the father of David. In these words the doctrine of the whole Book reaches its point of culmination. They point out the completion of the blessing pronounced on Ruth by Boaz. The name of the superstitious kinsman, who thought that marriage with the Moabitess would endanger his inheritance, is forgotten; but from Boaz descends the Hero (גִּבּוֹר חַיִל), the King of Poets, DAVID, the Prophet, and type of the Messiah. From him Christ comes through the promise, even as Obed was the son of Naomi through the love of Ruth.<sup>4</sup> The doctrine of the whole narrative is expressed in the words of the Apostle, "Love is the fulfilling of the law."

NOTE. — Verses 18-22 are an addition from the genealogical tables of the House of David. The chronological question involved in them must be considered in connection with the other analogous data, for which reason we refer here to 1 Chron. ii. 8 ff.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

"Naomi took the child." Whoever was once capable of true love, preserves its power forever after. Throughout her history, until the close of the narrative, Naomi's name is truly descriptive of her character. Her love is the cause of the bless-

1 The subterfuge of Le Clerc, who proposes to read אֶבֶד, in the sense of "unfortunate, poor one," with reference to the poverty once suffered by Ruth, is entirely wrong, to say nothing of the fact that the word itself does not have the sense which he assigns to it.

2 [But is not the emphasis to be laid on "to Naomi" rather than on "son?" It is true, that analogy leads us to expect the name to contain specifically the same idea expressed by the women (cf. however Gen. xix. 32); but it must also be admitted (with Berth.) that Obed in the sense of "one that serves," sc. Naomi, harmonises well with the words in ver. 15: "May he be to thee a soul-restorer, and a support of thine old age." — Tr.]

3 As regards the ע in אֶבֶד, its value (best compared perhaps with a spiritus asper) is exactly the same as in עֶלֶץ to be compared with latari and latus, עֶלֶץ with moliri, עֶלֶץ with μῆκος, etc.

ing that finally ensues, for by it she won love. It sustained her in suffering, — it prompted her to action in behalf of her daughter-in-law. Now in the end she enjoys its blessing, and becomes the loving foster-mother of the child of her who was better to her than seven sons.

Naomi is everywhere an image of the Church of Christ, which wins, confesses, and fosters through love. Men whose natural hearts are hostile to her, become her obedient children. When there is apostasy and misery in the church, it is for priests and preachers to repent, as Naomi did, and not to excuse themselves. If they really have the spirit of love, they cannot but feel that they have to blame themselves first of all. When the church does not make converts among heathen and Jews, the attempt to lay the guilt of this judgment on them, and to excuse ourselves, is a sign of a hard heart. Alas! God alone knows what heavy loads of guilty responsibility rest on the church for having herself given the impulse by which thousands were kept from coming to the Saviour. And how greatly she sins, when she does not rightly foster those who do come, exhibiting neither love, nor wisdom, nor faith in her treatment of them, — that too will one day be made manifest. Impatience is not in love; and a little money does not make amends for the coldness of consummate self-righteousness. They are children, who are laid in the lap of the church, — children according to the spirit, that is to say real children, who, by God's grace, bring a greater blessing to the church than seven sons according to the flesh.

PASCAL: "Two laws are sufficient to regulate the whole Christian Church more completely than all political law could do: love to God, and love to one's neighbor."

"They said, there is a son born to Naomi, and called his name Obed; he is the father of Jesse, the father of David." Boaz predicted a blessing for Ruth, and the faith through which he did it was rewarded by his being made a sharer in it. All he did was to utter a word of prophecy, prompted by his faith in the grace of his God, and lo, he was made the progenitor of David, the prophet! He who firmly relies on the love of God, is always a seer. Boaz had faith enough to bring about, in due time, the fulfillment of his own benediction, and became the ancestor of Him in whom all the prophecies of David are fulfilled. Of Boaz himself no warrior deeds are known, and yet the greatest of Israel's heroes, the conqueror of Goliath,<sup>5</sup> sprang from him. He conquered himself, and on that account became the ancestor of Him who triumphed over sin and death. Similarly, Ruth had

4 The reference of Grotius to the traditionary history of Ocrisia, who became the mother of Servius Tullius, is very unfortunate. Ocrisia was a slave. Her story has no ethical background. The legends concerning her were only designed to glorify the derivation of the king. Cf. Niebuhr, Röm. Gesch. i. 375 (2d edit.).

5 It is on the ground of this contrast that Jewish tradition homiletically advanced the idea that Goliath descended from Orpah, who returned to Moab, as David from Ruth. The early teachers of the church were acquainted with this tradition, and Prudentius even introduced it into his poem, Hamartigenia, ver. 783: —

"Sed pristinus Orphas
Fanorum ritus præputia barbara sunat
Malle, et semiferi stiprem nutrire Gollas.
Ruth, dum per stipulas agresti amburitur aestu
Fulera Boos meruit, castoque adacta cubili
Christigenam secunda domum, Davidæ regna Edidit atque deo mortales miscuit ortus."

nothing but a heart full of love, and yet to her, once a daughter of Moab, there was given what neither Deborah nor Jael obtained, — to become the mother of Him by whom all the nations are redeemed.

JEROME (on Is. xvi. 1): "O Moab! out of thee shall come forth the unspotted Lamb, which bears the sins of the world, and rules over the whole earth! From the rock of the wilderness, i. e. from Ruth, widowed by the death of her husband, Boaz derived Obed . . . and from David came Christ."

GERLACH: "Thus the coming of the great King is prepared for, upon whom the Lord had determined to confirm the dominion over his people for evermore; and the converted Moabiteess, who entered as a worthy member into the commonwealth of the people of God, became the mother of David and of Christ."

The Jewish tradition which makes Ruth a descendant of Eglon, the Moabitish king who oppressed Israel as a punishment for its sins, contains an allegory worthy of notice. The daughter of the oppressor, becomes the mother of the Liberator, the Redeemer out of the House of David. According to the Jewish expositors the name Ruth is derived from a root which signifies to give drink, to assuage thirst (Berachoth, 7 a); and from her, say they, David came, who with his songs and psalms supplied the wants of those who thirst after God. And from David, we may add, came the Saviour who gave to the Samaritan woman when she thirsted, of that fountain which springs up unto everlasting life.

The ancient church selected the sixteenth of July as the day on which to commemorate Ruth.<sup>1</sup> The reason for this is probably to be found in the following considerations: In Deut. xxiii. 3, it is said: "An Ammonite or Moabite shall not enter into the congregation of Jehovah; even to their tenth generation they shall not enter." This was supposed to have been fulfilled in Ruth. In the genealogy of the Gospel according to Matthew, Boaz, through whom Ruth was received into the congregation of Jehovah, is the tenth from Abraham. But it was the Lord and Saviour, whose day Abraham saw, and who according to the flesh descended from Ruth, who first took away the curse from Moab also. This was announced by Isaiah, when in addressing Moab, he says (ch. xvi. 5): "In mercy shall a throne be prepared, that one sit upon it in truth, in the tabernacle of David, and judge, and seek judgment, and hasten righteousness." Now, as the ancient church set apart the sixth of July for Isaiah, because he prophesied of Christ, who suffered on the sixth day of the week, and whose incarnation was celebrated on the sixth of January, it fixed the anniversary of Ruth ten days later, on the sixteenth of July. Thus her name and the number of her day are symbolical of prophecy and grace. But ten days farther on, the twenty-sixth, is the day of Anna, whom tradition makes to be the mother of the Virgin Mary. Thus the name of Ruth stood ten days after the prophecy and ten days before its approaching fulfillment, equally distant from him who prophesied of the Virgin and from her who was the Virgin's mother. The Moabitish stranger finds herself in the middle between the seer who beheld the wilderness of Moab become fruitful, and the nearest ancestress of Him who delivers Moab and all the world from barrenness and thirst.

Pictorially, the ancient church represented Ruth with a sheaf in her hand. As was natural, she was always conceived as youthful. She might be represented with a rose, in accordance with what may be the meaning of her name (see on ch. i. 4). The Rose of Bethlehem was the ancestress of the Rose of Jesse (Mary), whom ancient pictures represent sitting in a rosebush. Both rose and sheaf are symbols of the truth that though love may sow in tears, it will through God's compassion reap in joy.
